Senate approves amended election regulations

■ Senators, Mann reach compromise on rules.

By CAIT PURINTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student senators and Student Body President Tracey Mann are making compromises to improve elections.

After Mann vetoed an elections regulations bill last week, he made eight suggestions for amending it. Senate used seven of Mann's suggestions.

Mann said he vetoed the bill because it was average, and average was not an improvement over what had been done in the past.

At Thursday's meeting, Senate passed three bills that will affect this year's elections.

Under the first bill, Senate approved a resolution instructing the Elections Committee to submit all campaign expenditure reports to the Collegian and to anyone requesting them.

"If people have a problem with how much money is spent on elections, they can see it for themselves what was spent," Student Senate Vice Chair Jake Worcester said.

The second bill pushed back the candidacy filing date one week. The filing date is now set for Feb. 19, two weeks before general elections.

"Moving the dates back is a good idea. I'm glad we did that," Elections Committee Chair Joe Ashley said. "It gives us more time to get the word out."

The bill gives the committee more time to have workshops, set up informational tables and prepare the committee.

"The schedule is now perfect," Ashley said.

The third bill made several changes to campaign expenditures, including changing the definition of the term "campaign expense" to include articles of clothing. In the old regulation, articles of clothing were excluded from the report.

The amount each presidential ticket is allowed to spend in general elections has also changed from $815 to $3,000. The $180 cap on run-off elections did not change.

New limits were put on the amount of contributions candidates can receive. Candidates can accept donations from K-State faculty, students and relatives. However, each presidential ticket can only accept $15 from each donor. Individual contributions used to be set at $50. Each presidential ticket cannot receive contributions totaling more than $815 to general elections and $180 to run-off elections.

All contributions have to be itemized in the expense and contribution report. The name of the donors and their relationship to the candidate are also required on the report.

"This is going to be easier to slide into. It's a lot like what we have now," Worcester said. "It definitely makes candidates accountable for their expenses and what they do in their campaign."

This year the Elections Committee will randomly audit expenses and five contributions on each presidential ticket.

Elections Committee members were announced at the meeting. Ashley said their target projects are grievances and volunteers for polling places.

Ashley said candidates can fill out a grievance form if they think someone is breaking election regulations. The complaint goes before the Election Committee which then can decide on any penalties.

Other Senate business included approving the Task Force for Independent Living. The Task Force will only last this semester and is designed to get independent living students more involved with campus activities. It will be made up of six independent living students and two students from organized living.

The student body president's off-campus housing director will also be on the Task Force and will appoint two people from organized living.

Student Body Vice President Andy Macklin also updated Senate on the athletic ticket sales proposal.

He said he talked to Athletic Director Max Erick Thursday, and the athletic department liked their ideas and are going to use them.

Student Governing Association proposed students should buy their athletic tickets by enrolling in a class. When students enroll in classes, they will enroll for athletic tickets. When the ticket class is full, students will be put on a waiting list for their tickets.

"It should work pretty well, and I think the athletic department is excited about it," Macklin said.

Higher ed plan faces tough sell

By LEW FERGUSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Members of a governor's task force knew their plan for changing the way Kansas manages its higher-education system wouldn't be easy to sell to the Legislature.

Questions posed by education committee members after they listened to details of the proposal Thursday proved the task force was right.

Sen. Janis Lee, D-Kensington, said the plan to restructure the state's post-secondary education system had a "glaring omission" because it didn't address funding.

Lt. Gov. Gary Sherrer said the task force was only asked to propose a plan, not come up with ways to fund the changes.

"We had a very clear, narrow mission and tried not to take the whole sandwich in one bite," Sherrer said.

He said the task force's plan would cost about $3 million — a fraction of the $150 million plan that passed the House in 1998 but failed in the Senate. That $3 million would be minuscule in a $650 million higher-education budget, he said.

A Board of Trustees to coordinate the community colleges could be funded with money now spent in the Department of Education to administer community college programs, he said.

"The cost of not changing, I guarantee you, is far greater," Sherrer said.

Sen. Laurie Bleeker, R-Great Bend, questioned why the task force would remove the community colleges' supervision from an elected State Board of Education and put them under a Board of Trustees appointed by the governor.

That eliminates accountability to the voters, she said.

Sherrer said the Board of Regents is appointed and said nobody is suggesting it doesn't do a good job running the state's six public universities.

Rep. Cindy Empson, R-Independence, said the 19 community colleges still would be operated by their locally elected trustees.

Sherrer spoke to a joint meeting of the House and Senate education committees in an attempt to gain

Jury recommends prison for Bradford

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A Riley County jury on Thursday recommended life in prison for a Missouri man convicted of murdering a rural Solomon couple.

The jury could have recommended the death penalty for Virgil Bradford, 28, of Kansas City, Kan., who was convicted last week of capital murder, aggravated robbery, aggravated burglary and two counts of felony theft.

But jurors could not reach a unanimous decision on the death penalty during 7 1/2 hours of deliberations.

Bradford is scheduled to be sentenced formally Feb. 23 in Dickinson County District Court. A co-defendant, Robert Verge, 24, also of Kansas City, was convicted of capital murder last year and was sentenced to 60 years in prison without parole.

Bradford smiled after the verdict was read, and his tearful mother, Emma Bradford, shook in her seat with emotion. The parents of murder victims Kyle and Christine Moore sat silently, showing little emotion.

The Moores, who were in their early 30s, were found stabbed and shot to death in their rural farmhouse near Solomon on Feb. 17, 1997.

Bradford, whose trial was moved from Abilene to Manhattan, was the only witness called by the defense. He admitted hitting Kyle Moore with an unloaded gun he carried into the home but denied stabbing or shooting either victim.

Bradford testified that he and Verge were heading west and stopped for gas at Solomon, but their car became stuck after they missed the entrance ramp to return to Interstate 70. They ended up near the Moore home and broke into it.

Authorities said they believe the Moores were shot to death with a .22-caliber pistol Kyle Moore kept in their bedroom and stabbed with a knife that came either from the residence or one of the couple's vehicles.

Lewinsky testimony will be broadcast

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Brushing aside Democratic objections, Senate Republicans on Thursday opened the door to public broadcast of Monica Lewinsky's videotaped testimony as they muscled through rules governing the balance of President Clinton's impeachment trial.

In a rapid-fire series of roll calls, majority Republicans also defeated a Democratic call for an immediate vote on Clinton's fate and an alternative set of rules that would have barred any public viewing of the questioning that Lewinsky is to undergo early next week.

By their votes, Republicans set Feb. 12 as a target date for a final vote on Clinton's guilt or innocence on the two articles of impeachment, which allege perjury and obstruction of justice.

"That's our goal, and we have set in motion a process that will get us there," Majority Leader Trent Lott said, although he conceded the target could slip.

Lott said the first deposition would be with Lewinsky Monday, and White House aide Sidney Blumenthal and presidential friend Vernon Jordan would be questioned over the two following days. All the sessions will be recorded on videotape, and Lott said, "Exactly what happens to that videotape is not clarified or limited."

That's up to the Senate itself to decide, he said. On another key point, Republicans left room for a vote on fact finding that would state formally that Western Wireless will build service center in Manhattan, employ 300

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Western Wireless Corporation, a wireless communication service that also does business as Cellular One, chose to build a customer service center in Manhattan, Chamber of Commerce officials said Thursday.

The company, based in Bellevue, Wa., owns combined cellular and Personal Communication Service licenses covering about 60 percent of the United States. Its cellular service, marketed under the name Cellular One, is used by more than 620 million customers in 90 markets.

In Manhattan, Western Wireless plans to hire 300 associates and invest about $28 million over the first three years.

Most of the employees would be hired locally or regionally, said Ann Harts, director of economic development at the chamber of commerce.

"They don't believe they will be bringing in very many outside people," Harts said. "They probably will bring some people from their Seattle offices to get the facility up and running."

Harts said they will be hiring untrained people and then go into an intensive training program that will last two to three weeks.

"Some of their telecommunications specialists and engineers will have to have some background, but the majority of the people will be trained with the organization," Harts said.

K-State might have been another key factor in recruiting Western Wireless.

"Western Wireless hires a majority of their employees as college graduates because they have an intense level of knowledge that needs to be related to their customer," Harts said.

The company has been looking at building in Manhattan since last summer, but the official decision to build was not made until recently.

During the selection process the company worked under the name "Project Wadley."

This was done because Western Wireless wanted to tell its current employees first, Harts said.

Western Wireless offers employee benefits, including medical, dental, 401(k) and salaries ranging from $8 to $11 an hour. It plans to build a 40,000 to 45,000 square foot building in Manhattan's Corporate Technology Park.

The city had awarded Western Wireless with $250,000 earlier this month from Manhattan's Economic Development Opportunity Fund in addition to its $2,703,400 incentives package from the state.

The company plans to invest between $7.5 and $10 million dollars during the first year.

Harts said the chamber of commerce believes the "Invest in the Vision" campaign, which is a strategy for moving the community forward, helped to bring the company to Manhattan.

Dan Colantone, president and CEO of the chamber of commerce, said the marketing resources the chamber has created help them sell Manhattan.

"These resources that we have secured have allowed us to be more visible," Colantone said.

During the selection process, Western Wireless was researched thoroughly by the chamber of commerce.

They looked at the company's contributions to the other cities in which they are located, its wages and benefits, whether it would hire full-time or part-time workers, its financial position and if the company fits the profile of Manhattan.

The long-term goals for development were also a consideration, Harts said.

She said that in 1989 and 1990 the "Vision 20 Report" was created by a large number of citizens who looked forward 20 years to see what Manhattan needed to be doing.

They found that diversification of the tax base and employment opportunities was crucial.

"This brings in more private sector jobs. It brings in revenues to the private sectors because they will be bringing in taxes and funds will be created," Harts said.

Another company is looking to invest in Manhattan, Harts said.

The company is being recruited under the name "Project Mentor."

It potentially would employ 97 people in the packaging and production of surgical dental supplies.

"Project Mentor" would invest $18 million over the next five years if it chooses to locate here.

Longtime K-State professor dies; services Saturday

Ching-Lai Hwang, professor of industrial engineering at K-State, died of prostate cancer at his home Jan. 21. He was 69.

Hwang first came to K-State to study for a doctoral degree in 1958. He received it in 1962 and began teaching at K-State in 1964.

He was a well-known expert in the field of engineering with more than 10 published books and more than 150 journal articles published on engineering, many relating to current world problems such as pollution, energy conservation and strategies for various military options in peace negotiations.

"Professor Hwang was an extremely important person in our program," said Bradley Kramer, head of the Department of Industrial and Mechanical Systems Engineering. "He was instrumental as a founding member of our Ph.D. program, and he was an outstanding faculty member."

Hwang also co-founded local companies HTX International Inc. and IBES Inc. and founded HCL International Inc. All three companies specialized in software development in the use of expert systems and artificial intelligence.

A service will take place at 10 a.m. Saturday in All Faiths Chapel. A reception at the Taiwan wing of the International Student Center will follow the service.

Hwang is survived by his wife, Meilang, and three children, Grace and Frank Hwang and Jean Carrant.

In honor of Hwang, the C.L. Hwang Scholarship Fund has been set up for students in the industrial and mechanical systems engineering department. This scholarship is especially for foreign students from Taiwan as well as minority students from the United States.

Donations for the Hwang scholarship can be sent to the industrial and mechanical systems engineering department in Durland 237.

Committee hears proposal to cut sales tax on food

TOPEKA — A proposal to reduce drastically the state sales tax on food to replace Gov. Bill Graves' plan to phase out the vehicle property tax was considered Thursday by the House Taxation Committee.

The food tax bill has 68 House members as co-sponsors — five more than the minimum needed for House passage.

The bill would reduce the 4.9-percent sales tax on most food items to 0.9 percent by fiscal year 2003, when state revenue loss would be $219 million. Local sales taxes on food wouldn't be altered by the measure.

"It's offered as an alternative to the car tax reduction," said the chief sponsor, Rep. Cliff Franklin, R-Merriam.

Franklin said Kansas is among 18 states taxing retail food for off-premises consumption. He said Kansas has the seventh-highest food tax in the nation.

"We want to see it go away. We don't care how it goes away," Franklin said.

Graves wants to phase out the property tax paid on vehicles by fiscal year 2004. Most of that tax goes to local governments, and the governor proposes to replace the lost funds from the state general fund.

The bill had opposition, particularly the Kansas Restaurant and Hospitality Association. The group said the bill discriminates against restaurants — which would continue to charge sales tax — and people who eat out. Also, there were calls for including vending machines.

Greenspan concerned by Clinton stock market plan

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan praised President Clinton's plan to use budget surpluses to shore up Social Security but said Thursday any permanent solution will require benefit cuts or higher taxes.

Under Clinton's plan, $2.7 trillion of $4.4 trillion in projected government surpluses over the next 15 years would be devoted to bolstering the Social Security system.

Greenspan called Clinton's effort to reserve the surpluses "a major step in the right direction." But he repeated his concerns raised last week about one element of the program, Clinton's proposal to invest $700 billion directly in the stock market.

"Even with Herculean efforts," Greenspan said, he doubted that such huge amounts of money could be insulated from political pressures to influence where the investments go.

Greenspan told lawmakers they also should understand Clinton's program isn't a total solution for the shortfall Social Security will face as the baby boomers retire in coming decades.

Social Security payroll taxes now total 12.4 percent of workers' wages, split evenly and paid by employees and employers.

"In all likelihood these taxes will have to be raised, or benefits cut, given that the system as a whole is still significantly underfunded," Greenspan said.

Patient moves fingers after historic hand transplant

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Hand transplant patient Matthew Scott flexed his new fingertips ever so slightly Thursday.

Scott, a paramedic from Absecon, N.J., received the left hand in a 14 1/2-hour operation that ended Monday morning at Jewish Hospital.

At the prompting of Dr. Warren C. Breidenbach, his hand surgeon, Scott made the fingers twitch faintly.

Breidenbach said he was testing the tendons that control finger movement. There is no feeling in the hand, he said.

The bracing of Scott's hand and his physical therapy will be important, Breidenbach said in an interview later.

"I can tell you Matt's going to give it every effort — he's an excellent patient — but the biologic process is going to ultimately control what happens, and we don't know. This is uncharted territory," Breidenbach said.

Scott, 37, lost his left hand in an accident with an M-80 explosive — a powerful firecracker — 13 years ago. He is one of "two people in the world with a transplanted hand, the other being an Australian who underwent the graft in Lyon, France, in September.

Study shows patch, nasal spray help smokers quit

LONDON — A study found that smokers who used a combination of a nicotine patch and nasal spray doubled their chances of quitting for six years.

The research by scientists in Iceland — which involved the longest follow-up of any such study to date — showed that 16 percent of those who used the combination did not smoke for six years, compared to 8.5 percent of those who relied only on a patch.

In the study, published in this week's British Medical Journal, scientists at the National University Hospital in Reykjavik enrolled 237 smokers in a program to help them quit.

After six months, just after the patch was removed, twice as many of the smokers on the combination therapy — 31 percent — were still abstaining, compared to 16 percent on the patch alone. At one year, the difference was almost triple, with 27 percent of those using the combination method still not smoking, compared with 11 percent of those who had used only the patch.

To qualify as a success, the smokers were not allowed to have a single puff.

Eagles winter near reservoir

■ Officials at the state park will honor the once-endangered bird with a special day next weekend.

By GINNY WRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bald eagles have made a temporary home in the treetops near Tuttle Creek Dam and Reservoir this winter.

It is customary for the once-endangered birds to migrate through Kansas during the winter, said Schanée Anderson, curator of education at the Sunset Zoological Park.

Every year, Tuttle Creek honors the bald eagle's comeback from the Endangered Species List with Eagle Day.

Eagle Day ceremonies begin at 9 a.m. Feb. 6 at Tuttle Creek.

"Eagle Day is free and open to the public," said Steve Prockish, park ranger at Tuttle Creek, who is in charge of the event.

Prockish said participants are asked to meet at 1520 Tuttle Creek Blvd. on Eagle Day. The activities include a one-hour indoor presentation on the life of bald eagles in the wild.

Anderson and her co-workers bring other birds of prey, such as a hawk, from the Sunset Zoo to join in the presentation, Prockish said.

Attendees then will be escorted on a road tour through Tuttle Creek Park, ending at the nesting place of the eagles.

There will be telescopes and binoculars set up near the eagles' nesting place so the participants can view the eagles in their temporary habitat from a safe distance.

Eagle Day is about more than honoring the bald eagles, Prockish said. He said it also was established to teach the public about these birds.

"It's just to increase people's awareness about eagles and touch up on their rise from the endangered list," Prockish said.

He said Eagle Day is a day to experience these birds in the wild.

Eagle Day is an educational experience for the whole family, Prockish said. Reservations are not necessary to attend.

Application deadline looms for scholarships

By GINNY WRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As much as $80 million in financial assistance is given to K-State students each year, said Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance.

The priority deadline for scholarship applications is Monday. The deadline for federal financial aid is March 1, and state financial-aid applications are due April 1.

Scholarships are awarded annually and can be obtained either through general university scholarships or through departments and colleges.

There are about 3,300 scholarships available each year, Moeder said.

"Seventy percent of the students get some type of financial aid in the form of loans, work, grants and/or scholarships," he said.

"I would estimate that about 8,000 do apply for scholarship consideration. Probably 40 percent of the applicants receive scholarships," Moeder said.

Moeder said some students think they don't qualify for scholarships but don't realize there are many different scholarships available, many of which have different criteria.

Some departmental scholarships are based on financial need and others on grades or accomplishments. In most cases, donors set the qualifying criteria.

"They may want the student to be from a certain county, in a certain major, with a certain grade point, or there may be a general scholarship that can go to any student with a good grade-point average," Moeder said.

Jessica Prochaska, junior in English, receives financial assistance to help her pay for her education.

"It helps me out a lot," she said. "It is a good thing to do."

To apply for Federal Financial Aid, pick up an application in the Financial Aid office in Fairchild Hall. Moeder recommends filling out the federal application as well as the State Financial Aid application at the same time for priority.

Pope's plea halts execution

By PAUL SLOCA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. — Gov. Mel Carnahan commuted the death sentence of a convicted triple murderer to life without parole on Thursday, citing a personal plea by Pope John Paul II.

Darrell Mease originally had been scheduled to die at the same time John Paul was visiting the state this week.

"In reaching this decision, I took into account the extraordinary circumstances of the pope's request and the historical significance of the papal visit to St. Louis and the state of Missouri," Carnahan, a Baptist, said in a statement.

"I continue to support capital punishment, but after careful consideration of his ... appeal and because of a deep and abiding respect for the pontiff and all he represents, I decided last night to grant his request."

Mease, convicted of murdering a drug partner, the man's wife and their handicapped teen-age grandson in 1988, had been scheduled to die Wednesday, the second day of the pope's visit.

The date had been set in November by the state Supreme Court. Four days later, the court changed the execution date to Feb. 10. The court gave no reason, but many believed it was because someone had realized the original date coincided with the pope's visit.

The pope made several statements against the death penalty during his trip. "I renew the appeal ... for a consensus to end the death penalty, which is both cruel and unnecessary," he said.

The pope has spoken out frequently against capital punishment, sometimes making appeals in individual cases. In 1991, he asked Missouri to reduce the sentence of Glennon P. Sweet for killing a state trooper.

Closed sessions make Senate too secretive

The U.S. Senate's decision to go into closed session during the impeachment case of President Clinton is disappointing on many levels.

First, the Senate hurts its own reputation in a trial that has many Americans frustrated with partisan politics. Motions to open deliberations were also strongly partisan, with the vast majority of Republicans voting to keep the deliberations closed. It does not serve the Senate well to operate in secret at a time when citizens are already skeptical of what's going on in Washington.

There is also a precedence of openness in the country. The executive branch of the federal government, as well as most state and local governments are governed by so-called "sunshine" acts, which are designed to make public bodies debate and act in the light of their constituents. The most democratic of notions is to be able to scrutinize the actions of one's government. Operating in the dark deprives citizens of this right.

In such a historical and consequential trial, the public helps create a system of checks and balances for lawmakers. When sessions are open, senators know they must act on behalf of voters.

No members of Congress should get in the habit of going into closed session when confronted with sensitive information. Closed meetings are acceptable when discussing issues of national defense, for example, but not when discussing the future of the presidency.

Senators should rethink their position on closing deliberations. And until the deliberations are opened, lobbyists should continue to pressure senators into acting in the spirit of a democracy.

LIARS source of DISGRACE

Right-wing politicians should stop criticizing
Clinton, look at themselves

Even before Lewinskygate, many on the political right possessed a contempt for President Clinton for, among other things, being a habitual liar. How can you trust a man, the conservatives would ask, who has continuously lied (or in Clinton's mind, shaded the truth) about dodging the draft, smoking marijuana, and countless marital infidelities?

But before the political right condemn the President for his behavior, maybe they should take a good look at themselves. As of last week's deadline for my column, I believed that Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., was duped into his association with the white supremacist group Council of Conservative Citizens and that Lott was pretty stupid to be fooled like this. After this unholly relationship was exposed by the Washington Post this past December, Lott did condemn the CCC, other white supremacist groups and all the racist views these groups hold true.

Another prominent Republican who turns out to have had relations with the CCC is Rep. Robert Barr, R-Ga., the long-time anti-Clintonite whose most recent notoriety was being the staunchest proponent for impeachment on the House Judiciary Committee if not in the whole House of Representatives. When his association with the CCC was first exposed by Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, Barr said the "accusations were unfounded and deplorable." When asked to comment further on the CCC, Barr's spokesman, Brad Alexander, said in an article in the Washington Post that Barr was too busy working on the House impeachment and "he is not going to take time away from it to respond to groundless attacks by Professor Dershowitz." Finally, Barr did come out to say the CCC "does harbor some very unusual views that neither I nor any member of Congress endorses." However, Barr did add "it's a sad day in our country when a member of Congress cannot speak before a group without subjecting them to an exhaustive investigation." This is coming from a guy who was part of a group that had begun sustained inquiries into allegations that Clinton, among other things, had murdered White House aide Vince Foster and was involved in drug smuggling. Like Lott, Barr also denied knowing the CCC was a racist organization.

Well, it turns out these men are nothing but in-your-face liars. Both knew exactly what the CCC was about during the time of their association with the organization. The fact that both maintained the relationship after they knew the CCC was a white supremacist group makes them double-liars for saying they aren't racist.

In Barr's case, Gordon Lee Baum, the chief executive officer of the CCC, said Barr had received copies of the group's newsletter before he spoke to the group on June 6, 1998 in Charleston, S.C. Barr even admits to sitting in on a youth panel discussion preceding his keynote address in which the racist views of some of the group's members were made explicit. Barr said it "gave me serious pause," but decided, "I was there and I would speak and leave."

In last week's Collegian, Polica Houston poignantly reminded us in his column of these words of Martin Luther King Jr.: "The ultimate measure of a man is not where he stands in moments of comfort and convenience, but where he stands at times of challenge and controversy." Barr decided to stand in front of the CCC and give his crappy little speech.

As far as Sen. Lott is concerned, it turns out one of his favorite uncles, former Mississippi state Senator Arnie Watson, is currently on the CCC's executive board. This, along with the number of times Lott has spent at CCC-sponsored functions, would have made it impossible for him not to know the group is racist. While there is not much on which I can agree with the CCC, I do agree with Baum when he said, "We're a rather large organization in Mississippi. I would assume someone as astute as Mr. Lott would have a pretty good grasp of us."

Even if Lott and Barr do not believe whites are superior to all other races, the fact that they would pander to a white supremacist organization for political gain makes them racist.

Clinton's lies were lies to hide personal embarrassment. Lott and Barr's lies were lies hiding their hurtful nature toward others. Clinton might have disgraced the Oval Office for being the recipient of oral sex, but the disgrace Lott places on the role of senate majority leader, Barr on his seat in the House of Representatives, and Congress on the Capitol Building for their silence on the issue of racial hate is a disgrace far worse.

Hate-crime laws will not solve national problem of homophobia

The recent horror and outrage at the beating death of Matthew Shepard is justified. However, the calls for nationwide hate-crimes legislation, and President Clinton's pressure on Congress to expand the federal hate-crimes law to cover offenses based on sexual orientation is misdirected. Even if it were successful, focusing on legislation misses the deeper meaning of Matthew's tragic death.

The two men accused of this atrocity did not wake up one brisk fall morning and suddenly decide it was OK for them to kidnap a gay man, lash him to a fence post, and pistol-whip him until he was unrecognizable. Their behavior is the predictable, although not inevitable, consequence of our national homophobia. Fear and hate of gays, lesbians, bisexuals and transsexuals is learned, and to a large extent it is learned in our schools.

Matthew's death, like many before him, causes us to react with horror and repulsion. We attend candlelight vigils, call for something to be done, and then forget about discrimination against homosexuals until the next tragedy. Laws against hate crimes are needed in order to strengthen our resolve to punish the guilty. However, laws alone will do nothing to prevent hate crimes from taking place. By the time a person gets to the point where he or she is about to attack another person because of that person's sexual orientation, knowing there is a law prohibiting hate crimes will have no impact.

Matthew's death is the latest in a long line of hate crimes against homosexuals. In a 1996 case that has been widely discussed, Jamie Nabozany won a $900,000 out-of-court settlement, ending the first federal trial against a school for not protecting gay students. In this case against the Ashland School District in northern Wisconsin, it was alleged that the harassment took place from the time the student entered middle school in 1988 until he dropped out of high school as a junior in 1993. Nabozany said that abuse by other students ranged from name-calling to being shoved, beaten, spat upon and even having his head pushed in a urinal. He said he was kicked in the stomach so many times he later required surgery.

Although homosexual students share the same basic needs for acceptance as other students, studies reported by the National Education Association (NEA) indicate that gay and lesbian students are often at greater risk than other students for isolation, parental rejection, running away, and low self-esteem. According to the NEA, homophobia and discrimination exist in virtually all schools and often denies students of peer-group interaction, guidance by understanding role models, and instruction by sensitive educators. Tolerance of harassment against gay and lesbian students often leads to ostracism and violence against these students.

GUEST VIEWPOINT

ROBERT J. SHOOP

Students adopt the attitudes accepted by and expressed within their culture. The narcotic of peer pressure is incredibly strong. Students who come to school and observe gay bashing and other forms of homophobia as a routine behavior of their peers will likely adopt similar behaviors. Homosexual harassment occurs along a continuum. Milder forms, if left uncorrected, often develop into more serious forms. Harassment follows a pattern similar to Allport's five stages of prejudice in "The Nature of Prejudice."

1. Anti location — talking negatively about a group. I doubt that much can be done to intervene in private conversations. But, it is in these conversations that the seeds of homophobia are planted. In locker room humor, homosexual jokes and ribald stories lay the foundation for men and women to think of gays, lesbians, bisexuals and transsexuals only in sexual terms, and more specifically, in terms of derision and ridicule.

2. Avoidance — making conscious efforts to avoid members of the disliked group. I don't think it is possible to require that all students respect homosexuals. If a person's theology, philosophy, or environment has caused him or her to believe that homosexuals are evil, or sinful, or immoral, they have a right to think any way that they wish. However, such attitudes will perpetuate stereotypes and myths and will make it easier for them to tolerate crimes against homosexuals. People have the right to their beliefs; they do not have a right to act on their beliefs if that action interferes with another person's right to participate in society in an environment free of fear, harassment, hostility and violence.

3. Discrimination — undertaking to exclude all members of the group in question from certain types of employment or other social privileges. Whether it be the Boy Scouts of America, the Military, or a specific profession, keeping people out of organizations because of their sexual orientation reinforces the separateness between heterosexuals and homosexuals. It is easier to discriminate against an outsider group than it is an insider group. Homosexual harassment is a type of discrimination that physically or psychologically inhibits a person from equal opportunity in the basis of his or her sexual orientation.

4. Physical attack — personal attack and other forms of violence or semi violence. All forms of homosexual harassment whether verbal or physical are forms of attack, and all harm people. Many of the most abhorrent forms of homosexual harassment involve assault or battery. Our schools must make it clear that no one has the right to touch another person without the other person's permission.

5. Extermination — the ultimate expression of prejudice. Matthew Shepard's death makes it quite obvious that some homosexual harassment progresses to assault and ends in murder. Matthew is only the most recent example of this. However, there is another type of extermination that sometimes results from homosexual harassment. The ultimate negative response to non-acceptance of the adolescent's homosexuality can result in attempted or successful suicide. I recently talked with the parents of a young boy who committed suicide. They believe their son's death was caused by the harassment he suffered at the hands of his fellow students. In another community a lesbian student was driven from school by rumors and taunts. She later committed suicide. Although many people will never move from anti location to avoidance, or from avoidance to a higher level on the scale, activity on one level makes the transition to a more intense level easier.

The harassment of gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender students is a daily occurrence on school buses and in hallways, in classrooms and laboratories, in gyms and on playing fields. The best way to honor the memory of Matthew Shepard is to call our local board of education and demand that they initiate harassment prevention programs at all grade levels. Until we make it absolutely clear to our children that no one has the right to intimidate, harass, threaten or harm another person, and that it is not acceptable to use such epithets as "queer, homo, dyke, or fag," we can expect to read about future Matthews. They will be our sons, daughters, brothers, sisters and friends.

I love Taylor Grimes' Conspiracy Theory. I don't miss it any day. Also, I found it very disturbing on Tuesday when I read the story about the new 91.9 Wildcat. Since when did the Black Student Union control what music was played?

Generation needs to make a difference before millennium

I heard once that the closer we get to the end of the millennium the more apathetic we become. I don't know if the end of the millennium has anything to do with it, but when I look around, I see indifference everywhere, in everybody, including me. I know I don't have first-hand experience to testify for all of the past generations, but I have lived with my generation, our generation, and I see that it has nothing to bind it together. No common cause. So why shouldn't we be apathetic?

I reviewed this past century and looked at what each decade had to offer. They all offered a reason or cause for which people could join together and fight together. The purpose might not have united the whole country, but it united groups of people. The teens had World War I, the '20s had the suffrage movement, the Depression was in the '30s, and the 40's saw patriotism in its glory with World War II. The 50's hosted the beginning of the Cold War and Civil Rights movement while the '60s and '70s witnessed the remainder of the Cold War as well as Vietnam. Tragically, the best I found for the '80s was Michael Jackson's efforts for the children in Africa with We Are the World: the beginning of the end of togetherness.

So what do the '90s offer? What does our generation have to unite us? Instead of sit-ins to protest the inhumane treatment of people, I see people sitting outside coffee shops protesting Starbucks' corporate takeovers.

Is this what it has come down to? Are there just so few major problems in the world that we can afford to complain about coffee? And I mean complain. How many times have I heard people talk about how terrible the environment has become, but only one in ten of them actually recycles or rides a bike or carpools to work. Or even closer to home, people speak of how terrible the Student Governing Association is here at K-State, but how many of those critics bother to attend the weekly meetings to voice concerns to the Student Senate directly? We have become a lazy group of people.

The truly upsetting thing is that not all of the causes of the past decades are resolved. We need not look further than Jasper, Texas, where James Byrd Jr., a black man, was tied to and dragged behind the truck of three avowed white supremacists until his body slammed into a culvert, severing his head. Do you call that a resolved issue?

Or take the women's liberation movement. Women are still paid less and promoted slower than their male counterparts. But the issue has been swept under the rug by so many people, including women, that we don't even think of it as a problem anymore. Are we just getting bored with issues and moving on to others?

We are the antisocial generation. We are the generation of the television and the computer. I knew a couple of roommates who played hearts against each other. Cards are great with me. I have no problem with this. But they weren't even in the same room — they had networked their computers so each could be in their own room. How can we possibly work together when we are reluctant to leave our bedrooms?

So what can you do? Get out there and volunteer, teach and learn. If you don't have any ideas of things to do, go to the Office of Student Activities and Services on the first floor of the K-State Student Union to get a list of all the organizations we have here on campus.

Go to a few Black Student Union or Native American Student Body meetings. Join Habitat for Humanity or Amnesty International. Help educate people about HIV/AIDS with the STD, HIV/AIDS Peer Educators (SHAPE) program. Go talk to a Women's Studies teacher to learn more about where we were, where we are now, and where we need to go to reach sex equality. Pick up a piece of trash on your way to class or say hi to a complete stranger. Make a difference everyday. Pick your battle and stick with it. Inspire others to join you.

Remember, though, that all change happens first in our attitudes and beliefs. So if you find yourself having a wasteful, racial, hateful, painful, scornful, judgmental, revengeful, or just egotistical thought, do something about it.

For myself, I'm going to go find out where Howie's Recycling is and recycle the ubiquitous beer bottles in my yard that people keep throwing there. What are you going to do today?

The harassment of gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transsexual students is a daily occurrence on school buses and in hallways, in classrooms and laboratories, in gyms and on playing fields. The best way to honor the memory of Matthew Shepard is to call our local board of education and demand that they initiate harassment prevention programs at all grade levels. Until we make it absolutely clear to our children that no one has the right to intimidate, harass, threaten or harm another person, and that it is not acceptable to use such epithets as "queer, homo, dyke, or fag," we can expect to read about future Matthews. They will be our sons, daughters, brothers, sisters and friends.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds. To call the Fourum, dial 395-4444.

I love Taylor Grimes' Conspiracy Theory. I don't miss it any day. Also, I found it very disturbing on Tuesday when I read the story about the new 91.9 Wildcat. Since when did the Black Student Union control what music was played?

Generation needs to make a difference before millennium

I heard once that the closer we get to the end of the millennium, the more apathetic we become. I don't know if the end of the millennium has anything to do with it, but when I look around, I see indifference everywhere, in everybody, including me. I know I don't have first-hand experience to testify for all of the past generations, but I have lived with my generation, our generation, and I see that it has nothing to bind it together. No common cause. So why shouldn't we be apathetic?

I reviewed this past century and looked at what each decade had to offer. They all offered a reason or cause for which people could join together and fight together. The purpose might not have united the whole country, but it united groups of people. The teens had World War I, the '20s had the suffrage movement, the Depression was in the '30s, and the 40's saw patriotism in its glory with World War II. The 50's hosted the beginning of the Cold War and Civil Rights movement while the '60s and '70s witnessed the remainder of the Cold War as well as Vietnam. Tragically, the best I found for the '80s was Michael Jackson's efforts for the children in Africa with We Are the World: the beginning of the end of togetherness.

So what do the '90s offer? What does our generation have to unite us? Instead of sit-ins to protest the inhumane treatment of people, I see people sitting outside coffee shops protesting Starbucks' corporate takeovers.

Is this what it has come down to? Are there just so few major problems in the world that we can afford to complain about coffee? And I mean complain. How many times have I heard people talk about how terrible the environment has become, but only one in ten of them actually recycles or rides a bike or carpools to work. Or even closer to home, people speak of how terrible the Student Governing Association is here at K-State, but how many of those critics bother to attend the weekly meetings to voice concerns to the Student Senate directly? We have become a lazy group of people.

The truly upsetting thing is that not all of the causes of the past decades are resolved. We need not look further than Jasper, Texas, where James Byrd Jr., a black man, was tied to and dragged behind the truck of three avowed white supremacists until his body slammed into a culvert, severing his head. Do you call that a resolved issue?

Or take the women's liberation movement. Women are still paid less and promoted slower than their male counterparts. But the issue has been swept under the rug by so many people, including women, that we don't even think of it as a problem anymore. Are we just getting bored with issues and moving on to others?

We are the antisocial generation. We are the generation of the television and the computer. I knew a couple of roommates who played hearts against each other. Cards are great with me. I have no problem with this. But they weren't even in the same room — they had networked their computers so each could be in their own room. How can we possibly work together when we are reluctant to leave our bedrooms?

So what can you do? Get out there and volunteer, teach and learn. If you don't have any ideas of things to do, go to the Office of Student Activities and Services on the first floor of the K-State Student Union to get a list of all the organizations we have here on campus.

Go to a few Black Student Union or Native American Student Body meetings. Join Habitat for Humanity or Amnesty International. Help educate people about HIV/AIDS with the STD, HIV/AIDS Peer Educators (SHAPE) program. Go talk to a Women's Studies teacher to learn more about where we were, where we are now, and where we need to go to reach sex equality. Pick up a piece of trash on your way to class or say hi to a complete stranger. Make a difference everyday. Pick your battle and stick with it. Inspire others to join you.

Remember, though, that all change happens first in our attitudes and beliefs. So if you find yourself having a wasteful, racial, hateful, painful, scornful, judgmental, revengeful, or just egotistical thought, do something about it.

For myself, I'm going to go find out where Howie's Recycling is and recycle the ubiquitous beer bottles in my yard that people keep throwing there. What are you going to do today?

Cats to go to Super Bowl

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two K-State players will be suited up and in action on national television on Super Sunday, just maybe not in the way they would like.

Wildcat standouts Michael Bishop and Martin Gramatica have been selected to participate in the Compaq College Football All-Star Challenge. The competition will air at 3 p.m. Sunday as part of Fox's all-day Super Bowl pregame coverage.

The challenge will pit the two Wildcats against a number of standout seniors from across the country. The quarterback competition will pit Bishop against the likes of Daunte Culpepper, Cade McNown, Donovan McNabb and Joe Germaine, while Gramatica will test his leg against Wisconsin's Matt Davenport and University of Southern California's Adam Abrams.

Steve Woodward, director of communications for Intersport, the company producing the telecast, said to be able to land such highly decorated players for the competition was ideal.

"We were very fortunate that a vast majority of our A-list was available," Woodward said. "We're very happy about that."

Woodward said the competitors were chosen based on their statistics as well as the importance they demonstrated in game situations.

"We were looking for the impact players of this past season, who demonstrated from week to week that they were making a difference in their games," he said. "Obviously Bishop and Gramatica fit that bill very well."

Those who made the grade will compete in a number of competitions that will test specific skills depending upon their position. The quarterbacks will participate in the "Aerial Assault," which tests their ability to hit moving targets at varying distances, and the "Run & Shoot," which tests their ability to navigate an obstacle course, and then pass to a target on the run.

Gramatica and the other kickers will participate in the "Kicking Quest," which gives them 60 seconds to hit six field goals from varying alignments and distances. Also included in the competition are the "Shake and Bake" and the "Obstacle Rush," a pair of events designed for running backs and wide receivers.

No prizes are at stake in the competition, but participants received an all-expenses-paid trip to Miami and tickets to the Super Bowl. However, the chance to show off to legions of NFL scouts watching the game is a valuable perk as well.

"No scouts are officially involved in the competition, but I have a feeling that some will find their way to the event as ticket-holders," Woodward said.

Gramatica said that he, for one, isn't concerned with the prizes or the hoopla. He said he just wants to do what he does best. For him, the chance to compete against some of the nation's top kickers is prize enough.

"The scouts have seen me in practices and all-star games," he said. "They know what I can do. I'm just looking forward to going out and kicking."

Notre Dame, Tulsa will challenge tennis team plagued by injuries

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State tennis team returns to action this week with many questions still unanswered. After starting the season 0-3 in Arizona, the Wildcats will try to bounce back despite injuries and illnesses.

The Wildcats will face 16th-ranked Notre Dame in Oklahoma City on Saturday. On Sunday, they will play the University of Tulsa in Tulsa.

The Cats have two players that are sick, one recovering from surgery last semester and another who has been having eye problems.

Martina Pospisilova and Kathy Chuda, the only players who won in Arizona, are sick with the flu. Alena Jecminkova had surgery on her ankle last semester and has had to sit out practice because of swelling. Eva Novotna has had problems with blurry vision.

Head Coach Steve Bietau said he sees this weekend as a chance for the players to improve from their last outing.

"We want to expand on the things that went well last weekend," he said. "We want to use the experience we gained."

The doubles teams struggled in Arizona and hope to turn things around in their matches this weekend.

"We definitely want better doubles play," Bietau said.

On Saturday they face a deep Notre Dame team that approaches this weekend with a 1-1 record.

On Sunday, the Cats face a familiar Tulsa team, which competed against K-State in last year's regionals. Pospisilova and Novotna lost to Anousjka Van Exel and Jennifer DeSpain of Tulsa.

Tulsa is not ranked high, but is still a good team, Bietau said. "The team is much deeper than it has been in the past, which is similar to the way I expect us to be at some point this season," Bietau said.

Bietau said it was hard to judge where the team stands early this season, especially after playing three great teams.

"There are two significant things we learned last weekend," he said. "First of all, we didn't compete as well as we would have liked. The second thing is that we played very strong teams. If you're not playing at your best then you're going to get beat."

"IF YOU'RE NOT PLAYING AT YOUR BEST THEN YOU'RE GOING TO GET BEAT."

Pro wrestling needs place in next Olympics

Thinking up an idea for an interesting sports column has been rather difficult recently. After all, football season is practically over, and Super Bowl coverage is being beaten to death (Go Falcons).

I hate the NBA after the lockout and Jordan's retirement. My favorite sport, baseball, doesn't get underway until April, and frankly, I just don't know enough about golf or hockey or curling to warrant a halfway decent column. So, basically I was hopelessly stuck until inspiration finally hit on Sunday, the date of the World Wrestling Federation Royal Rumble.

For those of you who don't know what the Royal Rumble is, it is a professional wrestling event. Yes, yes, I said professional wrestling.

Afterwards, I struggled to find an argument for professional wrestling as a sport, but after hours of contemplation, I think I've found one. To help me explain this, I called on the Collegian professional wrestling analyst, Bob.

"You see, professional wrestling is a sport due to the sheer acrobatics of the thing," Bob said. "You have to pick people up and throw people down and be able to endure the same punishment as well. Take into account that you've got wrestlers diving off a set of ropes onto their opponents."

"Their opponents don't give — it's got to hurt both men. And these guys are humans, they get nicks and bruises, but they have to shrug it off and compete week after week. Wrestlers have no off-season like those other sports. Therefore, wrestling should definitely be considered as a sport. I like to think of it as a combination of kickboxing and gymnastics with a little more color and a steel chair here and there."

OK, I know exactly what you're thinking. You're thinking, "but Michael, wrestling is fake, it's all choreographed." Well, I say, "so what?" Being choreographed certainly doesn't make it not a sport; if you're not down with that, I've got two words for you: synchronized swimming.

If synchronized swimming is an Olympic sport, I think we definitely should give professional wrestling a chance as an Olympic sport. I called on Bob, our wrestling analyst, again to get his professional opinion.

"OK, everybody, close your eyes," Bob said. "Never mind, you won't be able to read this column with your eyes closed. Keep your eyes open and imagine 'Stone Cold' Steve Austin, one of pro wrestling's more colorful characters, cleaning house at the next Olympic games and then accepting a gold medal for the United States while drinking a Steveweiser and then giving the Stone Cold Stunner to the Olympic officials. Talk about your instant ratings boost."

"It brings tears to my eyes just thinking about it. Which would you rather watch, a figure-skating competition or someone getting his skull cracked open with a steel chair? I sure know which one I'd pick. Can I get a hell yeah?"

Oh yeah, Bob. Maybe we could somehow integrate the two. I'm thinking a caged ice rink match between The Undertaker and Tonya Harding might be neat. It sounds kind of interesting, if you smell what I'm cooking.

Cats to play rival KU, hope to bounce back from loss to Aggies

The K-State women's basketball team ventures into Jayhawk territory Sunday afternoon to battle intrastate rival No. 23 Kansas at Allen Field House.

K-State, 11-7 on the season, looks to bounce back from a devastating 73-59 loss to Texas A&M on Wednesday night.

Kansas, 15-6 on the season, returns all five starters this season including junior Lynn Pride, a Kodak Top-10 All-American, who averages 18.9 points per game.

Despite the Jayhawks winning two of the three meetings last year between the two teams, K-State still leads the all-time series 40-35.

Coach Deb Patterson said Kansas has been performing extremely well recently, particularly in its victory over Texas Tech, the top team in the Big 12 Conference.

"They appear to be playing outstanding ball at this point in the season, coming off a win over Texas Tech and a great road win last night at Texas," Patterson said. "KU has established itself as a top-25 program through the course of a long season, so we obviously respect the quality of basketball that they've played on a consistent basis."

With the Jayhawks shooting 45 percent, Patterson said the Cats cannot control Kansas' abilities, but they can alter the outcome of the game.

"I think the challenge for our team is identifying the standard to which we hold ourselves individually and collectively for each game," Patterson said. "I wholeheartedly believe that the key for us to be competing toe to toe with KU rests in what we bring to the table."

Patterson said her guards' lack of experience might affect the game. Kansas guards, though young, have more experience, but both K-State point guards have proven their abilities.

"I think we have one of the best point guards in the league in Essence Perry," Last year, Jennifer Jackson proved to be one of the best point guards in the league as well. Kansas brings size at the point that we don't possess, and our wings are young."

Patterson said she will look to junior centers Angie Finkes and Olga Firsova and junior forward Nicky Ramage, who led the team in scoring in the Texas A&M game, to try to shut down Pride.

The players said their loss to the last-place Aggies showed weakness in defense and intensity, and this will be in the back of their minds in Lawrence.

"If you play good defense, then your offense follows," Finkes said. "We didn't play defense tonight. We're definitely going to learn from this game and hopefully take it into this weekend."

Patterson said the Cats will have to perform at the top of their game to pull out a victory in Lawrence. While she said she believes the team has the ability to win, it will take more than the performance it gave Wednesday night.

"I believe we have the ability to beat any team in this league," Patterson said. "It requires our very best game to do so. Anything less than our best with respect to intensity, execution, discipline, focus, and we're not in the ball game with anyone in this league."

Atlanta Falcons aim to halt Denver Broncos' repeat dreams

By BARRY WILNER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — For more than three decades, Super Bowl Sunday meant little to the Atlanta Falcons. It was a day to spend almost anywhere but in front of a television set, watching two other teams vie for the NFL title.

For more than two decades, Super Bowl Sunday was downright painful for the Denver Broncos. It was a day for fans to stay away from their TV sets to avoid the carnage.

When they meet at Pro Player Stadium on Sunday, both teams might spend a moment reflecting on just how far they've come in the past year.

For the Broncos, their sixth Super Bowl is entirely unlike all the others.

They've come here as champions, carrying a self-confidence and, yes, a swagger that they gained by finally winning the big game.

They're even keeping a light-hearted atmosphere at practices. On Wednesday, a small plane trailing a message of "Broncos" Keith Burns at Beachplace Today 7-10 p.m." drew some good-natured razzing from his teammates, who yelled, "You da man."

The Falcons, never before a championship factor, finished 7-9 in 1997. Yet now they've come to Miami with the highest of expectations, a slight sense of awe mixed in with a heavy dose of innocence, and the recognition of how different things are this January.

While both are playing for the same reward, they are approaching the chance to be atop their profession from entirely different perspectives.

Happily for Denver, that means not having to answer all those "Why did you lose?" questions.

"It's a lot more pleasant, the fact you're not talking about past Super Bowl failures all the time," John Elway said. "It's a heck of a lot more positive. From 1988 until last year, I answered the question whether my career would be complete without a Super Bowl victory. I haven't had to answer that question since."

Now the questions are about repeats and dynasties. The Broncos are so self-assured that they have no problem dealing with those topics. In the past, they merely hoped they could win a Super Bowl. Now, they know they can.

"Whenever you get into a game of this magnitude and lose four in a row, it definitely takes some wind out of your sails," said Mike Lodish, who went through his own personal Super Bowl trauma (0-4) with Buffalo before joining Denver and getting that first title 12 months ago. He wasn't even in the league when the Broncos lost their fourth Super Bowl in as many tries in 1990.

"To win it is something you can't measure, the feeling you get is so great."

That feeling has bred a boldness and created a confidence in the Broncos that is immediately noticeable. Where previous AFC champs from Denver seemed to fear what might happen in the Super Bowl, these guys can't wait to prove their mettle once more.

"Last year, we had all the questions about never having won a Super Bowl," placekicker Jason Elam said. "We were big underdogs to the Packers and no one gave us a chance against them. I think there was more pressure on us in that game."

"This season, we came in expecting to go back. We're playing with a lot of confidence, but at the same time, we're not complacent. We're not taking the Falcons for granted."

But just about everyone else took them for granted for nearly as long as the Super Bowl has existed.

It has been clear all week that the Falcons — with the rare exceptions of Cornelius Bennett, Eugene Robinson and coach Dan Reeves — feel privileged to be here. They might not be in over their heads, but they aren't exactly old hands at this Super Bowl stuff, either.

"I've been through 12 hard years of blood, sweat and tears," Jessie Tuggle said, "and to finally get here, how much sweeter can it be than that?"

"I wanted to be a part of the solution for the Atlanta Falcons after so many years of losing. It's a long time coming for me, us, the organization and the whole city. Nobody at the beginning of the season thought the Atlanta Falcons would be here in Super Bowl 33," he said.

Reeves, Falcons hope to dance their way to football championship

By ELLIOTT MINOR
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMERICUS, Ga. — Those perennial losers 115 miles to the north never drew much interest here, where folks didn't get excited about the Atlanta Falcons until their hometown hero became coach.

People in Americus, a town of 16,500 in the southwestern Georgia peanut belt, have followed Dan Reeves' career since he played quarterback at Americus High School. They rooted for him as a player at South Carolina and with the Dallas Cowboys, then as coach with the Denver Broncos and New York Giants.

They were happy with his success before, but now that he has taken the home-state team to the Super Bowl, they are ecstatic.

A "Falcon Fever" banner hangs over the entrance to City Hall, and "Dirty Bird" merchandise is in nearly every store window. Municipal employees plan to wear Falcons T-shirts to work Friday.

Mike Denham, an Americus insurance agent, bought season tickets for the Falcons after Reeves took over the long-suffering team.

"I still can't fathom the Falcons in the Super Bowl," Denham said. "But he (Reeves) just instantly brought class and credibility to the whole organization."

Steve James, browsing in the Winn-Dixie supermarket that had a "Dan's the Man" sign in the window, withstood years of Falcons ineptitude before Reeves became coach in 1997.

"I've been waiting all my life for this," said James, of nearby Ellaville. "I watched them when they were down and out. When they got Dan Reeves, I told a friend, 'Give him three years and he'll make something out of the Falcons.' It took only two years."

Reeves' 82-year-old mother, Ann, and some cousins still live in the area. Reeves, 54, hasn't lived here for years, but — even when he was in New York — he never lost the drawl or manners that he picked up in south Georgia.

Many locals credit the area's strong tradition of youth football for the success of Reeves and another Americus native, Chan Gailey, who led the Cowboys into the playoffs this season in his first year as coach.

Gailey and Reeves both played quarterback for former Americus High coach Jimmy Hightower, 69, who said Reeves had a coach's attitude when he was a teen-ager.

"He was a student of the game," Hightower said. "He wanted to know why we did things. He studied the scouting reports."

Reeves married his high school sweetheart, Pam, who was a cheerleader when he was the quarterback.

At The Home Place, a furniture store and antique shop run by two of Reeves' cousins, Jo Evelyn Bone and Sue Brewer, well-wishers signed a banner that will be delivered to the Falcons.

The cousins recalled that Reeves was even competitive as a child in family football games played in a cow pasture.

"He loses his temper, but he's not a nasty competitor," Bone said. "He's competitive where it comes to getting the job done, but he never expects more of others than he's willing to give himself."

Some people in town were disappointed when Reeves was fired by the Broncos in 1992, in part because of a feud with quarterback John Elway.

"If I could go to Miami, I'd slap Elway's face," an elderly woman shopping at the furniture store said.

Hightower said Reeves always has had the ability to concentrate on the game, and not let off-the-field problems bother him. He believes it was Reeves' willpower that enabled him to return to the sidelines earlier this month, less than a month after undergoing heart bypass surgery.

"The football game is the big thing for him," he said. "Dan is a strong-willed person — mentally and physically tough. He doesn't like to lose at anything. He's the toughest competitor in my 35 years of coaching."

Running back Jamal Anderson and the Atlanta Falcons are the surprise entrants in this year's Super Bowl. Despite Anderson's 1,846 rushing yards and 14 touchdown, the 14-2 Falcons needed an upset of the NFC favorite Minnesota Vikings to earn their trip to Miami. (KRT Photo)

WHAT THEY are saying

"A good player has to have no fear. One you get scared, you make mistakes. I think a lot of guys in football are fearless, reckless. That's how you have to be, but with a little stability — just a little — too."

"They're always trying to intimidate you, and you have to show you won't back down or you're not afraid of them. You're there to play, too."

— Falcons WR-KR Tim Dwight on his playing style.

"Steve DeBerg is old enough to be my father, and he's still in the league. How old is he, 105?"

— Broncos TE Shannon Sharpe on Atlanta's 44-year-old quarterback, Steve DeBerg.

"Bill Romanowski? I still hate him."

— A smiling Broncos WR Ed McCaffrey about rugged Denver linebacker Bill Romanowski, once an enemy and now a friend.

"This is one of those fights that will go 12 to 15 rounds."

— Falcons RB Jamal Anderson, whose father handled security for Muhammad Ali and does the same for Mike Tyson, on how tough Sunday's game will be.

"We made each other. He taught me how to play football, and I taught him how to talk to the media."

— Falcons T Bob Whitfield on his working relationship with RB Jamal Anderson.

"People have us as seven-point underdogs. So I thought I would put on my dog collar."

— Falcons CB Ray Buchanan, sporting a new fashion accessory at Media Day.

"There were a heck of a lot more positive times during Dan's tenure in Denver than there were bad times, a lot more. I tend to focus on the positives. ... It's water under the bridge for me, and we're moving on."

— Broncos QB John Elway on the feud between Falcons coach Dan Reeves, formerly Denver's coach, and former assistant Mike Shanahan, now Denver's head coach.

"I want to be really respectful of the song. I will be completely covered. I probably won't be wearing black spandex."

— Cher, who will sing the national anthem Sunday.

"The conditions would have to be just right, at the end of the half or a desperation thing at the end of the game. And it depends a lot, I think, on how I kick this week in practice. If I'm kicking terrible in practice and falling short from 55, then Mike (Coach Mike Shanahan) won't let me have a shot at it. If I'm kicking well, he will."

— Broncos K Jason Elam on the possibility of a record-setting Super Bowl field goal.

"I don't like Super Bowls. But make no mistake, I love my job."

— Terry Bradshaw, who will participate in Fox's nearly seven hours of pregame programming.

"I started getting superstitious about being superstitious. As you get older, you stop remembering what it was you're supposed to be superstitious about."

— Broncos QB John Elway.

Students use interviews for experience, critiques

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Seventeen firms, 21 representatives and approximately 115 students will participate in the Architectural Mock Interviews scheduled for today. The interviews give seniors and graduate students an opportunity to meet with employers and discuss interviewing techniques, résumés and portfolios.

A committee composed of students from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design met in Fall 1998 to decide what firms to invite to K-State for interviews. After narrowing the number of firms to 17, students signed up to meet with the firm of their choice. The first day of registration was open to only fifth-year seniors and graduate students. Fourth-year seniors could sign up on the second day.

Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said the interview's format benefits students as well as firms.

Each interview lasts up to 40 minutes. The first 30 minutes are the interview itself, and the last 10 minutes are reserved for critiquing students and their portfolios.

"This program better prepares students for employment interviews and completing a quality résumé and portfolio," Schuley said. "It also introduces the employer to the excellent students we have at K-State."

Firms from Missouri, Illinois, Texas, California and Florida are participating in the event. They want students to have a variety of firms and areas of the country from which to choose, Schuley said.

Kasha Good, fifth-year senior in interior architecture, said the interviews will teach her the skills she needs to apply for jobs later.

"Real interviews are coming up in the next couple of months, and it's good to have suggestions on portfolios right now," Good said. "The whole purpose of this is to get practice."

It is also possible some of the firms will hire architecture majors after these interviews, Good said.

"Some of the students could definitely get jobs from any of these firms," Good said. "I'm not really interested in these locations right now, so I'm using this as practice more than anything."

K-State is the only architectural program in the country that has such extensive mock interviews, Schuley said. The program's popularity has grown tremendously during the past eight years.

"It is so amazing. We have very well-known firms attending," Schuley said. "We now have firms from all over calling us and asking if they can come participate in our interviews."

Commander criticizes Clinton Iraq strategy

By TOM RAUM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. military commander in the Persian Gulf sharply criticized the Clinton administration's strategy for toppling Saddam Hussein, saying U.S. support for Iraqi opposition groups is ill-conceived and could destabilize the region further.

"The last thing we need is another rogue state," Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni said at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Thursday.

"Even if we had Saddam gone, by any means, we could end up with 15, 20, 90 groups competing for power," he said.

Zinni criticized what has become the centerpiece of long-range U.S. policy toward Iraq. President Clinton last week designated seven organizations eligible for up to $97 million in U.S. military aid under the so-called Iraq Liberation Act of 1998.

Zinni told the panel, "I will be honest. I don't see an opposition group that has the viability to overthrow Saddam at this point."

At the State Department, spokesman James Foley defended the policy.

"The administration is determined to redouble its efforts to work closely with the members of the Iraqi opposition in order to promote regime change in Iraq. ... And we will be reviewing the possibility of different ways of working with them in the coming weeks and months."

"But I would fully endorse Gen. Zinni's conclusion that we believe that this is not going to be an easy or short-term effort," Foley said.

Zinni, who commands all American forces in the Persian Gulf region, also said that Iraq still might have Scud missiles capable of reaching Israel and retains the capability of manufacturing biological and chemical weapons.

Still, Zinni rated overall success of Operation Desert Fox as high. "We're seeing more damage — damage that we were very conservative in estimating until we had more proof or more evidence," he said.

He testified as military officials announced that two U.S. warplanes dropped bombs on an anti-aircraft artillery installation in Iraq on Thursday after observing fire from the site.

There were no reports of any damage to the F-15Es or injuries to their crews. Both planes continued their patrols of the northern no-fly zone over Iraq after the incident, Capt. Mike Blass of the U.S. European Command said.

Zinni told the Senate panel that since the end of the U.S. strikes in December, Iraq had violated no-fly zones more than 70 times.

"I think it's clear that Saddam has been a loser and his air defense system has been a loser in these engagements," Zinni said. "I would emphasize, though, our pilots are still at risk. This is not an undangerous mission."

In criticizing the policy of support for Iraqi opposition groups, Zinni took on a prized congressional Republican initiative, one originally opposed by the administration.

An early critic of the plan, Zinni was asked by senators if he'd changed his mind now that the administration had embraced the policy as its own.

But Zinni said the policy "could further destabilize the area" and "could be very dangerous."

"The last thing we need is a disintegrated, fragmented Iraq," Zinni said. "Because the effects on the region would be far greater, in my mind, than a contained Saddam."

"Now Saddam is dangerous. Saddam should go. There's not a doubt in my mind," he said. "But it is possible to create a situation that could be worse. And that's my concern."

Defense Undersecretary Walter Slocombe, testifying at the same hearing, supported the current policy, saying: "We believe we have a comprehensive strategy."

Ford announces plans to purchase Swedish Volvo

By BRIAN AKRE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DEARBORN, Mich. — Ford Motor Co. is buying the far-smaller Volvo car division in a $6.45 billion deal that accelerates the consolidation of the global car industry and gives Ford a brand beloved by safety-conscious baby boomers.

Purchasing the Swedish business also gives the world's No. 2 automaker a greater share of the highly competitive European market.

The deal announced Thursday is similar to last year's merger of Chrysler Corp. and Daimler-Benz AG of Germany. In each case, the two companies involved do not make lines of cars that directly compete with one another.

Volvo will retain its commercial truck and engine business and is in talks to merge those operations with Swedish truck-maker Scania.

The deal still must be approved by Volvo shareholders.

Ford executives stressed at a news conference that Volvo's management and factories would remain in place and that Volvo cars would retain their unique personality, style and reputation for quality and safety.

"One thing that cannot change is their Swedishness," said Jac Nasser, Ford's new president and chief executive officer.

Volvo cemented its reputation in the United States in the 1970s, when many baby boomers decided they liked the boxy, somewhat stodgy cars more than what was coming off American assembly lines.

Karate Club members practice techniques Tuesday night in Ahearn Field House. The Karate Club meets every Tuesday and Thursday evening at 8:30 in Ahearn. JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

EXERCISE for the MIND and BODY

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Typical images of karate often include breaking wooden boards and ice blocks in half or the "Karate Kid" trilogy in the 80s.

While these stereotypes might fit some karate organizations, they do not apply to K-State's Karate Club, said Charlene Gibson, the club's president.

"We have a much more modest philosophy," Gibson said.

The main purpose of the Karate Club is to exercise both the body and the mind and to focus on karate as a form of self-defense and not a form of attack. Karate, a martial art that has its origins in Okinawa, Japan, was designed originally as an exercise of both the body and the mind through discipline and techniques.

Gibson said the techniques and exercises in karate can prove to be useful resources for relieving tension for its members.

"We've had students who need physical activity after a long day of lectures and classes," she said, "but it is both a mental and physical workout. We learn flexibility and coordination between the upper and the lower body."

"Mainly, it's a combination between mental and physical exertion."

Gibson said she initially joined the Karate Club to learn self-defense but soon found there was more to the club.

"There is also a great amount of discipline that goes with it," she said.

Maureen Rider, adviser of the Karate Club, said she agreed.

"The exercise of karate is learning to concentrate and elevate your level of flexibility," she said.

The Karate Club meets every Tuesday and Thursday evening at 8:30 in Ahearn Field House. Rider said the club currently is trying to reserve a multi-purpose room in the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, but space in the Rec is limited.

"They don't have space for us to do anything in," Rider said, "but one of our members has been trying to work something out with the Rec Center."

Tuesday meetings usually are intended for newer members of the club, while the Thursday meetings are designed for the more advanced members.

JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Futoshi Miyasato, (right) graduate student in mechanical engineering, and Roy Monfort, freshman in sociology, demonstrate karate techniques to other Karate Club members Tuesday night in Ahearn Field House. The main purpose of the Karate Club is to exercise both the body and the mind and to focus on karate as a form of self-defense and not as a form of attack.

"We don't go to the tournaments because we're more focused on the practicing," Gibson said.

Rider said the Karate Club provides a supportive environment for members.

Karate club members learn to relieve tension, improve flexibility

"The Karate Club gives K-State students a convenient place and group to work with," Rider said.

This semester, the Karate Club is participating in an exchange program in which a Japanese student from a University in Japan comes to K-State to continue his or her education and to help with the Karate Club.

Takahisa Kamatsu is a graduate student from Jose University who decided to come to K-State to study English literature. Gibson said she is honored Kamatsu is bringing his experience and knowledge of karate to the club.

"Takahisa could've chosen any university in the United States to attend, and he chose K-State," Gibson said. "This is a very unique opportunity."

Kamatsu, besides studying English literature, is active in helping with the Karate Club. He assisted in a karate demonstration in Ahearn Field House last week, which was open to the public.

Kamatsu said he has enjoyed Karate Club thus far.

"It is very similar to some of the karate clubs we have in Japan," he said.

For more information on the Karate Club, contact Maureen Rider or Charlene Gibson at 532-4421.

Art center cancels showcase scheduled for Saturday

The Manhattan Art Center's "Live at the MAC!" show scheduled for Saturday has been canceled due to scheduling problems.

The all-ages showcase for Manhattan-based band Ruskabank and other local acts was called off after organizers found difficulty in booking additional musicians.

"We just weren't able to get a good lineup for that night," said Mary Spiro Levin, administrative assistant at the arts center.

Levin said patrons of the arts center can catch the Valentine's Day Reader's Theatre, an informal reading of dramatic material with a romantic theme, and its larger production, "Meet Me in St. Louis," Feb. 26-28, and Mar. 4-7 and 12-14.

Dave Spiker, lead vocalist for Ruskabank and organizer of "Live at the MAC!" said the show was canceled in its early planning stages.

"We don't want people to think we're unreliable," Spiker said. "This show just didn't work out."

Ruskabank can be seen today at Streetside Records for its compact disc release party and later at 9 tonight at its performance at In the Bleachers.

Ruskabank will perform live with Ultimate Fakebook and Podstar as part of its release party for its new album, "This Took Some Time."

Tracks from the album scheduled to be played include "My Friends," "Gangster Girlfriend" and "I Been Around."

Tenor, pianist will perform at McCain Saturday night

Grammy-nominated tenor Christoph Pregardien will perform along with pianist Michael Gees at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

In the first half of his Manhattan performance, Pregardien will sing 12 songs by Robert Schumann with lyrics by Justinus Kerner. In the second half of the show, Pregardien will sing another Schumann piece with lyrics by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Pregardien also will perform a variety of pieces by Ludwig van Beethoven, Carl Loewe, Franz Schubert and Hugo Wolf. All lyrics are by von Goethe.

Pregardien was nominated for a Grammy award for Best Opera Recording for his recording with John Eliot Gardiner, an English Baroque soloist, and Monteverdi Choir. In 1998, he was awarded the prestigious Ophee d'Or of the Academie du Disque Lyrique-Prix Georg Solti.

Although the performance will not be in English, text interpretations will be provided.

McCain Director Richard Martin said audiences shouldn't be scared off by the fact the performance will be sung in German because translations were provided.

"People, especially students, are put off by the fact that someone is singing to them in a language they don't understand," Martin said. "That's why we provide text and translation."

"These kind of recitals are an opportunity to expand one's horizon and to me, that's what being at a university is about," he said.

UPC presents 'In the Company of Men' Friday, Saturday

Delving into the darker side of the human condition, the Union Program Council's Kaleidoscope Films Committee is presenting "In the Company of Men."

The film is showing at 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. today and Saturday in Forum Hall. Admission is $1.75.

"In the Company of Men" focuses on two men who become dissatisfied with their lives and decide to take drastic steps to change them, said Chris Heeley, committee chairman.

"It centers around two white-collar workers who feel the world is passing them by, so they decide to take their frustration out on someone else," Heeley said. "They target a deaf woman and devise a contest to see who can seduce her or make her fall in love with him first, intending to then brutally dump her and destroy her as a person."

"In the Company of Men" was awarded a Filmmaker's Trophy in the dramatic category at the 1997 Sundance Film Festival.

Lexi Thompson, committee member, has seen the film and nominated it for inclusion in this semester's schedule.

Thompson said she believes it is a welcome addition to the Kaleidoscope lineup because it is a current film.

"We really try to keep up-to-date with the films that are coming out, so this was one of particular appeal to me," Thompson said. "It's also a good example of contemporary independent filmmaking."

Music professor performs 7-hour recital as fund raiser

David Littrell, professor of music, will present a Marathon Recital as a fund raiser for the Da Vinci String Quartet Residency from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. today in All Faiths Chapel.

Littrell will play the cello and accompanist William Wingfield will play piano for the seven-hour recital. The duo will perform pieces by Beethoven, Brahms, Rachmaninov and Hayden.

Littrell said he is looking forward to the performance and that the length of the performance will try on his musical skills.

"It's mentally taxing to give a recital," he said, "and this will be physically taxing as well."

Senators fight for opportunity to represent students at school, home

■ Current Kansas census process counts students in their home counties.

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas state senators want to claim K-State students, but so do the students' hometowns. This battle will be decided in an amendment that proposes an end to the adjustment of federal census figures.

Kansas is the only state that adjusts the federal census to count college students and military personnel in their home counties instead of where they currently live. This way of adding more people to small counties costs the secretary of state's office about $300,000 annually.

This tradition was started by an "agricultural census."

"The agricultural census counted the number of people, pigs and beds you had in your house," said Sen. Janice Hardenberger, R-Haddam, a committee chairwoman who favors the change.

It was replaced in 1988 by a constitutional amendment that required Kansas to adjust the figures.

"I am supportive of the proposed amendment, because it costs half a million dollars to take every K-State student back in their county," Hardenberger said.

Money is not the only issue. Congressional seats are based on the federal census, and the more people in a county, the more representation it will obtain.

After the 1990 census, Riley County lost more than 19,000 people to other counties, and Douglas County, home of the University of Kansas, lost more than 12,000. The census, however, allows prisoners to stay put, Hardenberger said.

Dan Colantone, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce president, was supportive of this amendment because he said it was important to know the true population of a region and have accurate data for the work force.

"The overall benefit is to the citizens of Kansas. It allows for true representation throughout the state," Colantone said. "There's an awful lot of students at the university. It's important we provide them with a voice."

But Sen. Tim Huelskamp, R-Fowler, said he disagreed.

"My problem is that most of the kids are registered at home, but they're still my constituents. They're still my voters," Huelskamp said. "It's against the republican form of government."

Hardenberger said if somebody came to Sen. Lana Oleen, whose district includes K-State and Fort Riley, she would not deny them because they were not originally from Manhattan.

"Are you really counted in my district?" She would never ask that," Hardenberger said.

Supporters want the proposed amendment to be on the ballot by April, when municipal elections will be taking place.

But before this happens, two-thirds of the legislators in both houses will have to approve it.

Local retailers, bars, students prepare for Denver, Atlanta matchup on Super Bowl Sunday

By SARAH CRAIG
AND PAM LEWIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Americans everywhere have chosen their seat to witness yet another Super Bowl this Sunday. Some will sit in the privacy of their own homes. Others will venture to bars or restaurants. Still others will venture to one party or another.

K-State students have a variety of plans for this year's matchup between the Denver Broncos and Atlanta Falcons. Regardless of which team fans are cheering for, most people have a day of camaradierie planned.

"We're going to have everybody in the house here, and we're going to barbecue some burgers, and people that are of age are going to partake in drinking of some alcoholic beverages," said Michael Chapman, sophomore in marketing and chapter historian for the Phi Gamma Delta house. "We're just going to have a big brotherhood night in the house."

Bars around Manhattan have various specials planned for the occasion. Some will serve chicken specials in honor of the Falcons, while others will have specialties for the Denver Broncos, like a "Mile High" sandwich served at Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbecue.

Pat's will also have its usual Sunday special of spare ribs. Manager Tony Malleon said he plans to run beer and blue margarita specials as well.

The bars are stocked with not only food and beverages but also numerous televisions. Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon is the home to 18 televisions, and Lucky BrewGrille has seven.

"We have five televisions," Pat's manager Tony Malleon said. "We expect a small but decent crowd. Sundays are always pretty busy. We will be prepared for a busier than normal Sunday."

Lucky's will give away more than 100 prizes to patrons throughout the game, including one grand prize. Last year's prize was a Plymouth Neon.

"We usually have a pretty good turnout," Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky's said. "It's a fun crowd — at halftime we always go over to the MTV halftime show, which is a lot of fun. Mostly just a lot of giveaways and drink specials. It's just a fun place to watch it, a lot more atmosphere and always a lot of fun."

Scoreboard is another option for Manhattan residents looking to watch the game somewhere other than home. The bar has three big-screen televisions, with a fourth to be in by Sunday, and eight regular-size televisions.

Tyler Olson, Scoreboard manager, plans to staff three to five extra workers for Sunday.

"We fill up every year," Olson said. "I don't pump promotions because people will already be here."

Many students who are not of legal drinking age plan to enjoy the game at their own home or at parties with friends.

"We're just going to go over to a friend's house and have a bunch of people," Jeff Wilke, sophomore in civil engineering, said.

"A bunch of food, lots of hot dogs, just cheap college food and a good time," he said.

Steve Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, said Bronco apparel sells year-round in his store because the team is supported locally.

Although Ballard's does not carry Falcons sportswear, they do have Super Bowl T-shirts and will be selling the official Super Bowl Championship T-shirt.

Teachers say they're unprepared

By ANJETTA MCQUEEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Four out of five U.S. teachers say they're not ready to teach in today's classrooms. More than a third say they either don't have degrees in the subjects they teach or didn't spend enough time training in them, according to a survey released Thursday by the Education Department.

The survey, answered by 3,560 teachers nationwide, asked kindergarten through 12th grade teachers about their college studies, professional certificates, on-the-job training and support from parents and colleagues.

"These findings are particularly unsettling given the increasing diversity of our nation's students," said Martin Orland of the department's National Center for Education Statistics.

Overall, 38 percent had bachelor's or master's degrees in a specific field, 37 percent had majored in general education and 18 percent had degrees in such subjects as math education.

After graduation, the teachers were more likely to be trained in state or district curricula (81 percent) than in special education (48 percent) or bilingual and diversity education (31 percent).

Of the teachers who had a special education or a bilingual student in their class, about 20 percent said they felt well-prepared to teach them. Though 78 percent of teachers reported training in technology, just 20 percent said they felt "very well prepared" to use it.

Education Secretary Richard W. Riley said the survey illustrates the need to change how teachers are trained for changing classrooms.

"One-shot" workshops ... carry little relevance to teachers' work in the classroom," said Riley, adding that he will present details of President Clinton's proposals to change in a speech next month.

"Teacher education and professional development programs are not addressing the realities found in today's classrooms," Riley said.

The department mailed the surveys early last year, and about 92 percent of those asked responded. The typical margin of error for the questions asked was plus or minus 3 percentage points, Orland said.

The findings echo those of a 1993-94 teacher survey, with little change in teachers' attitudes.

In 1998, new teachers were more likely to have majored in an academic field, to have had training especially designed for new teachers and to have smaller class sizes than their peers in 1994, survey researcher Becky A. Smerdon said.

Those changes reflect the shift in focus from student standards to teacher standards. States such as Florida now have incentives for teachers seeking better credentials.

Interview times available

School districts, cooperatives prepare to recruit education students.

By LORI OLEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is the last day College of Education students can sign up for on-campus interviews on Feb. 26.

Seventy-eight school districts and cooperative associations will come to campus and interview candidates.

"February is kind of an early-bird event," said Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services and College of Education liaison. "Employers want to get the best jump on the best candidates, so more are participating earlier."

The event is all pre-select interviews, which means students register to request an interview, and then employers choose whom they want to meet.

Students can sign up in Holtz Hall and employer selections will be posted starting Feb. 15.

"These early on-campus interviews are more of a screening process to help get your foot in the door," Kelly McMullen, December elementary education graduate, said.

McMullen is substitute teaching this spring in the Manhattan district because of a lack of full-time jobs available in the middle of the school year.

"I would like to get set in a position right now, but it's kind of early," she said.

"A lot of places don't know the definite openings they will have, but they still want to find the good candidates," McMullen said.

Several of out-of-state employers also plan to participate in the event.

"We recruit heavily from a four-state region, but we particularly think Kansas State has provided us with some excellent teaching candidates in the last five to 10 years," said Steve Fleming, assistant superintendent of human resources in the Liberty, Mo., school district.

Liberty, a suburb of Kansas City, has a district that is growing rapidly, so Fleming said he is looking to hire 60-70 teachers before next school year.

"We go to a lot of universities to recruit, so if we hire 10 or so from K-State, that's a large percentage and speaks highly of the quality of education and training they receive," he said.

One of the fastest-growing occupations in school systems is special-services education. Henderson said that can include special education, speech pathology and social work.

"There's a real demand, and that's reflective of the employers coming not only in the co-ops but also the school districts requesting special-services staff," Henderson said.

Education students will have another chance to meet prospective employers on a more informal basis at the Education Career Fair on April 7 at Bramlage Coliseum.

"The opportunities that come with bringing all these districts to one place has really helped, because otherwise I wouldn't know where to begin my search," McMullen said.

Clinton had committed offenses, even if he wasn't to be removed from office. The Democratic scenario would have prevented Republicans from even submitting such a document for a vote.

The White House accused the Republicans of power politics.

"It's clear the spirit of bipartisanship evaporated today, and that this has become a Republican impeachment trial," spokesman James Kennedy said. "The plan that was adopted is vague, and it has no certain end. It appears to contain trap doors that could significantly extend this trial."

Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, said, "This is not a deep dark plot on the part of Republicans to slip anything over."

The vote was 55 to 43 against a motion by Daschle to go immediately to four final hours of debate and then vote on the articles of impeachment. Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wisconsin, was the sole lawmaker to cross party lines, just as he was the only Democrat to vote Wednesday against dismissal of the charges.

Before that, the Senate rejected Democratic leader Daschle's plan to limit to writing all public evidence of the depositions of witnesses, preventing the showing on the Senate floor of the videotaping that the House Republican prosecutors want and the White House opposes. Playing the tape at the trial, unless the session were closed, would put it on national television.

The Republicans voted through their rules that would permit trial use of the videotapes and leave open the possibility of mass distribution by the Senate itself. 54-44. Two senators were absent, Democratic Barbara Mikulski of Maryland, who has been ill, and Republican Wayne Allard, who has an illness in his family.

The voting came after hours of sparring between Republicans and Democrats over the way to conduct the final stages of the trial. Despite the obvious partisan tensions, few if any senators expressed the kind of anger that marked proceedings late last year in the House.

Daschle told reporters he didn't fault Lott for the events of the day. "We simply couldn't bring this matter to a successful bipartisan resolution," he said.

Lott returned the favor. "I'm not ranting and raving and blasting them for their motives," he said.

Lott put the rival plans to votes with a minimum of explanation, which prompted one of his colleagues to ask about details.

Chief Justice William Rehnquist declined to answer Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah.

"The parliamentarian tells me it is never the function of the chair to interpret a resolution," Rehnquist said.

The votes unfolded after a day in which the trial had marked time while backroom negotiations dragged on.

At the White House, spokesman Joe Lockhart called for a swift end to the trial and said that in the Senate, "the Republican majority has to answer to the country of why they want to continue to extend this process."

The developments came one day after Republicans used their majority muscle to reject a call for immediate dismissal of the charges against Clinton, and to order subpoenas for Lewinsky, presidential friend Vernon Jordan and White House aide Sidney Blumenthal. But the 44 votes posted by Clinton's defenders on each of the two roll calls Wednesday might have been more significant, showing the president had more than enough support to gain eventual acquittal on the two articles of impeachment.

The "findings of fact" emerged as a main hurdle to an agreement, as well. They would involve a formal finding that Clinton committed some or all of the alleged offenses but would not remove him from office.

Some Democrats objected strongly, even before the small group of Republicans working on the issue had produced a final draft.

"We should not be able to do by majority vote what the Constitution contemplates by a two-thirds vote," Sen. Richard Bryan, D-Nev., said. "It would be constitutionally fraught with ... peril."

The witness issue has been a controversial one throughout the trial, and ironically, it appeared that each side — the White House and House prosecutors — wanted to preserve its right to seek additional evidence or witnesses if something unexpected turned up in the questioning of Lewinsky, Jordan or Blumenthal.

support for the task force proposal.

"The time is right and the potential (for improvement) is significant," Sherrer said as he made the pitch on behalf of the 19-member governance restructuring task force assembled last year by Gov. Bill Graves.

Sherrer, who served as co-chairman of the task force, said he hoped the Legislature would improve the plan, and he had this admonition:

"To discard it because it lacks perfection would be irresponsible. While there may be disagreements on what to do, there can be no doubt that something must be done."

The plan, endorsed by Graves, would create a seven-member Higher Education Coordinating Council to do strategic planning, analyze budgets for presentation to the Legislature, resolve disputes between institutions and serve as the data-collection agency for higher education.

It also would create a nine-member Board of Trustees to supervise the community colleges and 11 technical colleges and vocational-technical schools.

The regents would continue to administer the state's six public universities.

Firms chosen for OKC memorial

By JESSICA HALLIBURTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OKLAHOMA CITY — The office background noise is dull. Suddenly, a roaring, rippling noise spreads with sounds of panic and commotion. The room grows dark and quiet before 168 victims' faces flash rapidly around the room. The lights come up and the exit door opens.

The experience is just one of the audio, multimedia events planned by a design team selected for the Oklahoma City National Memorial Center. The center is a part of the Oklahoma City National Memorial for victims of the April 19, 1995, bombing that destroyed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building.

Work already is under way on the outside portion of the memorial on the site where the federal building once stood.

The team of Douglas/Gallagher, Hillmann & Carr and C.H. Guernsey & Co. was named Thursday to design the 24,000-square-foot center to be housed in a portion of the Journal Record Building. The building was heavily damaged by the bombing.

"This team will put together the chapters that tell a complete storyline of what happened April 19, 1995," said Bob Johnson, chairman of the Oklahoma City National Memorial Foundation trust.

Visitors will have access to interactive stations where they can view news coverage, oral histories of people who survived and those who responded. Multiple, large, projection monitors will show a variety of funeral services. A "Memorial Registry" will allow visitors to leave a message for the people of Oklahoma City.

Construction on the Memorial Center will begin in the spring of 2000. The center is expected to open to the public in the fall of 2001.

"The way they're going to be able to guide the visitors through the event step by step is amazing," said Bud Welch, whose daughter died in the bombing.

"I think when the visitor exits, they will have felt like they went on a journey much like that experienced during the bombing."

An Advertising Supplement to the Kansas State Collegian

KSU Students can 'Shoot for the Stars' when it comes to internships

KSU News Service

It may be cold outside, but the summer job market is already warming up, according to Kansas State University's career and employment services.

"It's not too soon for students to start their search for a summer internship or job," said Mary Marston, assistant director of career and employment services.

To help, career and employment services is sponsoring "Shoot for the Stars," Feb. 1-5. The week of events offers help to students who want to land experiential learning experiences, such as internships and summer jobs.

The week kicks off with Internship Resume Building, a workshop from 3:30 to 5 p.m., Monday, Feb. 1, in Union 213. "All K-State students who need to develop a résumé for a summer job or internship are invited," Marston said.

Special speaker for the week, career specialist Donald Asher, will present two sessions during the week. The first, "Internships from Bali to Birmingham: What to do With the Most Important Summer in Your Life," will be from 3:30 to 5:30 p.m., Tuesday, Feb. 2, in the Union's Little Theatre. Asher will discuss how students can successfully land internships.

His second session, "Self-directed Career Launch: How to Become a Millionaire Whether You Major in Art or Business," will be from 7 to 8:30 p.m. Tuesday, Feb. 2, in the Union's Forum Hall. The session is for K-State students interested in how to search for the right career and will discuss some practical search methods. Asher will sign copies of his books following his presentation.

Both sessions are sponsored by Career and Employment Services and the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

K-State's first Academic Majors Fair, "The Power of Possibilities," will be 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. Wednesday, Feb. 3, in the Union's Grand Ballroom. The fair is for students searching for a major or considering switching their major. It also will provide information on the benefits of having a secondary major or a minor.

Student Internship Networking is the title of a workshop to be offered from 8:30 a.m. to 12 p.m. Thursday, Feb. 4, in Union 212. The workshop will discuss how the power of networking can aid in the summer job and internship search.

The week will wrap up with the Internship Résumé Critique workshop from 3:30 to 5 p.m. Friday, Feb. 5, in Union 212. Career counselors will be available to review students' completed résumés for internships.

For more information on "Shoot for the Stars," contact Marston at Career and Employment Services, 100 Holtz Hall, 532-6506.

3 WAYS TO UNCOVER YOUR ABILITIES

You probably have a lot more to offer an employer than you give yourself credit for. The problem is, you don't know where to look for concrete examples of your "soft" skills—skills that can't be readily measured or assessed, such as interpersonal skills, ability to work in a team, or the other skills. Here are some suggestions on how you can uncover your hidden abilities—and bring them to the attention of an employer.

Look at your campus extracurricular activities. For example, if you are a member of the debate team, participate in the drama club, or work on the campus newspaper, these all can serve to showcase your communication abilities, written and oral, as well as other key traits, such as flexibility. Do you play sports? You've got an activity tailor-made to demonstrate your ability to work in a team. If you hold a leadership role in an extracurricular club or activity, be sure to highlight that.

Look at your course work, internships, co-op experiences. You can often find examples of how you've worked in a team (a class project, for example) or used your analytical abilities in your course work. A course that has a public speaking component, or one that requires extensive writing, can also be used to impress an employer with your abilities. Internships and co-op experiences also can provide you with examples of how you used your "soft" skills. Besides giving you valuable practical experience, these work-related experiences are often real soft skill-builders that help you learn how to work with others effectively—which is what employers are looking for when they search for candidates with interpersonal and communication skills who are flexible and able to work in a team.

Look at your part-time jobs/volunteer experiences. While your part-time jobs or volunteer experiences might not be relevant to the career you're seeking, remember that they may well have helped you acquire or hone certain skills that employers prize—such as interpersonal skills (dealing with customers) and analytical skills (how to solve a problem on the job). Even if you flipped hamburgers or punched tickets, for example, you dealt with customers, and that experience can be used to demonstrate critical skills to an employer.

WHAT IN THE WORLD IS A RÉSUMÉ?

The resume is a selling tool that outlines your skills and experiences so an employer can see, at a glance, how you can contribute to the employer's workplace.

Your resume has to sell you in short order. While you may have all the requirements for a particular position, your resume is a failure if the employer does not instantly come to the conclusion that you "have what it takes." The first hurdle your resume has to pass—whether it ends up in the "consider file" or the "reject file"—may take less than thirty seconds.

The most effective resumes are clearly focused on a specific job title and address the employer's stated requirements for the position. The more you know about the duties and skills required for the job—and organize your resume around these points—the more effective the resume.

You will need information to write a good resume. Not just information about jobs you've held in the past but also information to select the most relevant accomplishments, skills and experience for THIS position. The more you know about the employer and the position, the more you can tailor your resume to fit the job.

5 keys for effective résumés

Your resume is YOUR marketing tool, not a personal document. It is about YOU the job hunter, not just about the jobs you've held. It focuses on your future, not your past. It emphasizes your accomplishments, not your past job duties or job descriptions.

It documents skills you enjoy using, not skills you used just because you had to.

10 Steps in Creating a Damn Good Resume
Choose a target job (also called a "job objective"). An actual job title works. Find out what skills, knowledge, and experience are needed to do that target job. Make a list of your 2, 3, or 4 strongest skills or abilities or knowledge that make you a good candidate for the target job. For each key skill, think of several accomplishments from your past work history that illustrate that skill. Describe each accomplishment in a simple, powerful, action statement that emphasizes the results that benefited your employer. Make a list of the primary jobs you've held, in chronological order. Include any unpaid work that fills a gap or shows that you have the skills for the job. Make a list of your training and education that's related to the new job you want. Choose a resume format that fits your situation—either chronological or functional. [Functional works best if you're changing fields; chronological works well if you're moving up in the same field.] Arrange your action statements according to the format you choose. Summarize your key points at the top of your resume.

Yana says: In Real-Life resume writing, we DO skip around. So don't worry if your resume comes together in some other sequence—as long as you do #1 and #2 first!

Finding that elusive small company

■ How do you find small, growing companies? Where do you learn about their products and services, their market potential and prospects? The most effective way to gather this information is to develop contacts within the established network of small businesses. Try these techniques for breaking into that network:

■ Call the local chamber of commerce in the area where you would like to work—speak with the membership director. Ask for the names of growing companies and those involved in the industry of your choice, and for the chamber's calendar of activities, newsletter, and membership directory. (The directory may also be available at the local library.) Call members for information and leads.

■ Make the rounds of the networking clubs whose specific purpose is to provide marketing leads.—Be selective, because many of these clubs cater to the beginning independent businessperson or entrepreneur who is probably focused on selling his or her services. Directories of such clubs are usually available through the local library or chamber. Call the officer listed and explain your interest and career goals. The officer can tell you whether the club has members who may be able to help you, or can refer you to other clubs with a greater representation in your area of interest.

■ Participate in professional trade associations in your functional area. As with networking clubs, the objective here is to speak with as many members as possible to tap the hidden job market. Professional associations usually have local chapters associated with a national group. If you're interested in relocating to another city, you can tap into contacts in your targeted city through the association's national directory. Send prospects a cover letter and resume, and follow up with a phone call.

■ Contact vendors for the industry in which you're interested—ask them which companies are growing and which need your type of educational background and experience. To identify vendors, review the ads in journals for the industry you're targeting—again, these can be found in your library. Then use the phone book to find local vendor representatives.

■ Read trade publications and other business newspapers, particularly local business journals, for leads—Call the companies written about and speak with a manager in your functional area. Mention the information you read and express your interest in the company. Ask for a meeting to learn more about the company and industry and how your contact progressed to his or her position.

■ Speak with lenders that specialize in assisting small firms—Such as bankers, venture capitalists, and small-business investment companies (SBICs). Start by calling banks in your neighborhood and asking for the commercial lender who works with small businesses. Venture Capitalists and SBICs are usually listed in directories in the local library. These contacts may be harder to reach, so apply your greatest leverage by presenting yourself as a new graduate who is exploring every opportunity in the job market. Most people will be impressed by your initiative and assertiveness. Show respect for your contacts' experience and knowledge, and they'll be happy to share it with you.

■ Use your school's alumni directory to find some of your best networking contacts—Here you don't need to limit yourself to a particular industry. You hook in getting to speak to these contacts is your alma mater. Let them know your interests and goals, and they'll gladly refer you to other alumni or personal contacts who can help you.

■ You have many other potential networking contacts—Just use your imagination. Consider family, friends of family, neighbors, members of clubs and other organizations to which you or your friends belong, church members, professionals who serve your family—doctors, dentists, attorneys, bankers, etc. Dig out the family Christmas card list.

■ Once you reach your contacts, what do you say?—Develop your script beforehand; planning is critical. Your script should begin with a brief statement about your degree and work background and then an explanation of how you came to call this particular contact. For example, was it a referral or a lead from a publication? What's your interest in this company or industry? Next, have a series of questions for your contacts. Ask how they were successful on reaching their current positions.

Early preparation key to landing job after graduation

BETHLEHEM, PA — For 18-year-olds beginning their freshman year at college, finding a job after graduation is probably one of the last things on their minds. That mindset needs to change, however, according to career counseling and staffing professionals. They claim that it's the early birds—the students who begin to plan for their entry-level careers during their first years in college—who graduate with the competitive edge that makes them attractive to employers.

Although no one is suggesting that students need to decide on a major or career during their freshman year, both career counseling and staffing experts suggest students make an early focused effort to explore careers so that they know what kind of job they want when they reach graduation.

The students who flounder when it's time to look for a job often cannot articulate what they really want to do, and that indecision often shows during job interviews.

"Employers who are experienced interviewers know when they have someone who just needs a job versus someone who is seriously committed to a particular job," said Aminta G. Hawkins, director of cooperative education and career services at Drexel University in Philadelphia.

Even crash courses in how to conduct a job search can't make up for four or five years of student procrastination on career issues. Students who wait until the final buzzer is about to sound have missed opportunities to take advantage of internships and cooperative education experiences (alternating semesters of course work with semesters of work in a paid job relevant to one's major).

They have also missed the chance to become student leaders in campus and professional organizations. All of these activities not only give students a chance to see if a career is right for them, but they are the types of experiences that are prized by employers hiring new graduates.

Data from the National Association of Colleges and Employers' (NACE) Job Outlook survey confirm the importance of getting work-related experience throughout a college career. Overall, respondents indicated that an average of 58.6 percent of their 1994-95 entry-level hires had co-op or internship experience. Almost 70 percent of manufacturers' hires started their entry-level jobs with previous workplace experience.

Employers also reported in the survey that they seek leadership skills gained through participation in extracurricular activities and campus organizations, for example, computer skills, and a good grade point average in their entry-level candidates.

Alan Baker, manager of worldwide university relations for Dell Computer Corporation, is a strong proponent of the co-op experience. He reports that many of Dell's hiring managers request college candidates who have co-op experience, and in some cases that highly specialized co-op experience can count as much as a student's academic performance for certain employers.

"Co-op assignments offer students 'real world' work experiences prior to graduation. It exposes them to issues such as accountability and responsibility and gives them a chance to 'test drive' a company. Students who have successfully co-oped with a company are far more likely to accept a job from that company," said Baker.

In addition to co-op experience, Baker suggests students get involved with the student chapters of the various professional societies on campus.

"Whether their field is engineering or business, there's usually something for everyone. I think students' involvement in these groups can enhance their leadership skills and give them a real world window to the industry they're heading for," said Baker.

Early career exploration can be especially vital for liberal arts students, who are known traditionally for exploring career issues later in their college years and then becoming frustrated looking for a job when they don't really know what they're looking for, said Hawkins, whose university requires all freshmen to complete a course on career management and professional development.

Like Baker, Hawkins also suggests students take advantage of cooperative education programs. If not, then at the very least students should do multiple internships over the course of their education. "Students should start in the summer following their freshman year. They should find employment related to and area of interest but they shouldn't get discouraged if in their first experience as an intern they're not managing the office."

It's amazing what they can learn just by being in the environment," said Hawkins. "They gain a lot of experience in terms of knowing the politics of an office, workplace issues, what it takes to be successful in a job beyond having knowledge in a particular field—these students can test the waters," added Hawkins.

Employers, new grads find common ground leads to hire

BETHLEHEM, PA —Faced with a shortage of skilled technical employees, many employers are finding that some of the best new college recruits already work for their organizations. Students who are working as interns or cooperative education students—the “foot in the door” that has helped students land entry-level jobs in past years when the economy wasn’t booming—are now first-round choices of many employers. Employers rated their own internship and co-op programs a “very effective” technique for hiring technical talent according to the findings of a new study just released by the National Association of Colleges and Employers.

Employers also reported that offering a chance to use state-of-the-art equipment and tossing money on the form of high salaries and signing bonuses at members of the Class of 1998 were also effective techniques for securing hard-to-find skilled labor.

“Employers are trying everything they can think of to attract technical talent,” said Marilyn Mackes, NACE executive director. “New college graduates are looking for jobs that will offer them a challenge and a good start to their careers. It’s interesting that the internship and co-op programs students used to use to gain experience employers demanded of new hires is one of the first places employers look now for skilled labor.”

Employers believe in “growing” their own talent through internships and cooperative education programs. Almost two-thirds of respondents said they sponsor a co-op program and 77 percent employ interns. Of the co-op students, three-fifths (59.8 percent) will convert to full-time employment; of the interns, 35.1 percent will be hired full-time by their sponsoring companies.

The survey also revealed that the use of signing bonuses has grown as technical expertise has become rarer. The practice of offering signing bonuses is practically de rigueur for employers who recruit at the top M.B.A. schools and an expected part of salary negotiations for graduates holding computer science and other technology-related degrees.

More than half of the respondents said they use signing bonuses and reported that they were spending $500 to $20,000 to woo candidates with particular skills or experiences.

The average bonus awarded was $2,609.

A total of 472 HR/Staffing professionals responded to NACE’s annual Employer Benchmark Survey. Results of the survey appear in the Spring issue of NACE’s Journal of Career Planning & Employment. NACE is the leading source of information for human resources professionals who recruit and hire college graduates and for career services practitioners on college campuses who advise students and graduates in the career planning and job-search process.

1999 College of Education interview events

February 26 and April 7, administrators from school districts in Kansas and many other states will be converging on K-State’s campus to interview prospective teacher candidates from all teaching fields.

February 26 Pre-select interviews

On February 26, administrators will be interviewing candidates using what is called a pre-select format. These interviews will take place from 9:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. on the second floor of the K-State Student Union.

With the pre-select interview format, candidates will request an interview with an employer by signing up in Holtz Hall and depositing a resume and/or a cover letter in the provided packets. Your résumé will be sent to the administrator and the administrator will select candidates he/she wishes to interview. The names of the selected candidates will then be posted in Holtz Hall. If you have been selected for an interview, you’ll be required to come to Holtz Hall and sign up for an interview time.

Most interviews in the pre-select format will last 30 minutes. For more information on when you need to sign up to request an interview, who is coming on February 26 and what teaching fields they are seeking, please check the Career and Employment Service home page at www.ksu.edu/ces (we will start posting names of participating school districts in January 1999.) Look under the category “Education Employment” and then click on the link “Interviews on Campus.”

April 7 Educator Career Fair

A new and exciting Career Fair will take place on April 7 in Bramlage Coliseum. There will be no pre-select interviews on this day. Participating school districts will have a table in Bramlage Coliseum on April 7, from 9:00 am to 4:00 pm, and representatives will be available to visit with you on a first-come, first-serve basis. No need to sign up to request an interview — just come to Bramlage on April 7 with numerous copies of your resume in hand. This doesn’t mean you should come to the event unprepared, however. Determine which districts will be coming on April 7, what teaching fields they’re requesting, and conduct research on the district prior to April 7. This type of preparation will make your experience at the Career Fair much more productive.

For more information on who will be coming on April 7 and what teaching fields they are recruiting, please check the CES home page at www.ksu.edu/ces (we will start posting the names of participating school districts early February 1999). Again, look under the category “Education Employment” and then click on the link “Interviews on Campus”. Expect to see school districts from Kansas, Texas, Wisconsin, Arizona, Colorado, California, Nebraska, Missouri, Nevada, and other states participating in this event!

Remember, these interview events are open to students and alumni of Kansas State University. If you have any questions, please feel free to contact Tim Henderson or Jan Richardson, Career and Employment Services, 532-6508.

"THE BOTTOM LINE IS THAT THEY ARE THE FUTURE."

GENERATION X

Generation X is bold, quick, computer-savvy; companies learning to cope

By MAGGIE JACKSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — It was the first day of school for Macy's new assistant buyers. The twentysomething recruits had barely signed in when one bustled up to training chief Bernadette Commisa, asking: "How am I doing?"

"That took me back! We had only just come in and taken attendance," Commisa recalls. "They see the world a little differently than we did."

Bold, savvy, confident and often demanding, the 45 million youngsters dubbed Generation X are hard to miss in today's workplace, and the staid side of Corporate America is only just learning — sometimes with eyebrows raised — to cope with them.

Companies from Macy's to Deloitte Consulting are revamping their training and recruiting programs, educating managers and streamlining communications to better understand and utilize this sometimes maligned generation.

"All we were exposed to was the (images of the) earring in the nose, snowboards and baggy clothing," says Deborah Gatti, senior training specialist for Mervyn's department stores. "We've had to train our culture about the great things about these folks, and their shortcomings, and how we can support them."

Sandra Bench, a 24-year-old Mervyn's manager in Okemos, Mich., is well aware of her generation's mixed reputation. "To me, Generation X defines an age group; to others, it defines a work ethic and many other things as well," she says.

But wait. Good young workers have always questioned authority, asked lots of questions and rattled their elders' nerves. Is today's youth so different?

It seems so. Just as baby boomers were shaped by Watergate and the Vietnam War, the generation that ranges from their 20s up to mid-30s has been influenced by this era of technology, television, daycare, divorce and downsizing.

As a result of growing up in a fast-paced world, these young adults are said to be even more skeptical and impatient with the status quo than previous generations. Often reared as latchkey children, they're fiercely independent, yet needy — working well alone but requiring liberal doses of feedback. Disgusted by their parents' workaholicism, they defend their right to a full life outside of work.

"The GenX age group does come to the workplace with different expectations and experiences," says Don Blanton, human resources director at Sandia National Laboratories, a Lockheed Martin subsidiary that has revised key management training programs in the last year to include lessons on what makes Generation X tick.

Just take a look at the many companies this generation has started, in Silicon Valley and elsewhere. Their offices are freewheeling, egalitarian, fast-paced, surf's-up kind of places, where play is taken as seriously as work. It's no wonder that many conservative companies, run by aging baby boomers, have begun trying to adapt to this younger crowd.

And adapt they must. A big reason that companies are bothering to bend to the new generation is they are literally "hot stuff."

They get three, four or five offers in this tight job market, and many are confident to the point of arrogance. Further, they move on quickly. Americans hold an average of nearly nine different jobs by their 30s, according to the Labor Department.

Today's grads are bold enough to ask a prospective employer uncomfortable questions such as, "If I don't like what my boss says, can I go to the next level?" says Debbie Herd, manager of college relations for J.C. Penney.

"With the strong economy ... they can ask those questions that can push a company close to the edge of not liking them," says Herd, adding that young candidates have been so tough that J.C. Penney tossed its "fluff" brochures and now gives out hard-core information, even details on salaries, at job fairs and first meetings.

Generation Xers also are making splashes in the workplace. Macy's East, a division of Federated Department Stores, had to change its training of managers and of new recruits to keep up.

Buyers had problems keeping the new generation of executives "motivated, stimulated, challenged and growing in their new careers," recalls Lawrence Naishtut, until recently vice president of merchant development and recruitment.

About 18 months ago, Macy's began sending top managers to a class on supervising employees that included lessons on Generation X.

"Some of the older management needed to recognize that life has changed," said Naishtut. "Who cares whether (GenXers) are good or bad? The bottom line is that they are the future."

At the same time, Macy's began training assistant buyers on what they could expect at work, since paying dues isn't considered a GenX strong suit. "They're wondering why they're not at the Giorgio Armani show the minute they get placed," says Commisa, the merchant training director.

Deloitte Consulting, whose average worker is 35-years-old, responded to GenX demands for feedback by adding to its evaluation process a primer on how to succeed at the company, says human resources managing director Karen Morrell.

GenXers crave such roadmaps in order to manage in a world where workers get downsized regardless of seniority and skills quickly grow obsolete, says Bruce Tulgan, a Generation X consultant.

To satisfy their strong needs for independence and recognition, they also like to feel they're in the driver's seat.

That's why Mervyn's revamped its recruit training from an ad hoc effort largely based on shadowing managers to a more formal program that includes self-paced written studies and active training. "They've got the remote control," says Gatti. "It's up to them to get through the program."

Russ Hamilton, a 23-year-old Mervyn's manager in San Jose, Calif., thoroughly approves. "For me, to read about and then actually do it makes me more comfortable with it," he says. "It allows me to feel confident in that task or job."

His generation is also comfortable drawing the line at too much work. They are driving companies to allow employees to make use of work-life programs that were little promoted or honestly supported.

They clearly reject the baby boomers' workaholic ethic.

Karen Morrell recalls one Deloitte consultant who, after two years with the company, asked for a year's paid sabbatical. He didn't get it, but she says she has to admire the Generation X boldness.

"If they want something, they ask for it. ... (and) it's good business sense to listen," she says.

"Their sense of balance and perspective and self-motivation is very good for our business."

Proposal combines tickets, enrollment

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

TICKET BREAKDOWN

Student tickets for the 1999 football season are divided into four categories:

GENERAL ADMISSION

Football only 4,700
Football/basketball combo 2,700

RESERVED

Football only 1,300
Football/basketball combo 1,200

TOTAL 9,900

SOURCE: Department of Intercollegiate Athletics
TRAVIS D. LENKNER/COLLEGIAN

Students will no longer have to stand in line for football tickets if a new proposed plan goes into action this semester.

Student Body President Tracey Mann, Student Body Vice President Andy Macklin, their cabinet, the Senate intern class and the athletic ticket committee came up with a plan to make football ticket sales easier and more efficient.

The plan, proposed to Athletic Director Max Urlick, makes buying tickets like getting into a class. When students pre-enroll either by the K-State Access Technology System or in person in Willard Hall, they would have the option of choosing whether they want football tickets or not.

There would be four options to choose from: football ticket only/general admission, football ticket only/reserved, combo tickets/general admission and combo tickets/reserved.

Since students enroll by seniority, the ticket sales also would be by seniority. Just like enrolling in a class — once a class fills up, it's no longer available to students — once an option filled up, it would no longer be available to students.

"Treating it like a class is very intriguing," Urlick said. "When a class fills up, they would have to go to the next class."

Last year's enrollment went by class and an alphabetical system so many students who had more hours enrolled after students with less hours. Macklin said students will not have to worry about this happening, because K-State has already gone back to the regular system of enrolling by seniority. So, students with the most hours will get first pick of the football ticket options.

"If demand exceeds supply, it will be the newer students who will not be able to attend," Urlick said.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics also is going to increase the number of tickets available to students by 1,000, and there will be no price change, he said. There should be around 10,500 tickets available for students, including 500 for the K-State Marching Band.

Students would be able to pick up their tickets from the Athletic Ticket Office sometime during the fall semester.

Macklin said students are lucky ticket prices are staying the same and available seats are increasing after voting down the stadium expansion referendum.

"They could have decreased the seating and hiked up the prices," he said. "Our athletic department is very pro-student."

Underclassmen might not like the idea because they will be without tickets if more upperclassmen buy them, but Macklin said this system is better for them in the long run.

"Even though they may not get tickets their freshman year, they'll be guaranteed to get them in their sophomore, junior and senior year, which wasn't so last year," he said.

If tickets are available for underclassmen, it'll probably be combo, Macklin said. If this is so, then it will be a lot like last year because underclassmen had to buy combo in order to be guaranteed tickets.

Seniors and juniors don't have to buy combo tickets under the new system.

Students have mixed opinions about the proposed system.

Student killed in car accident Friday morning

By JESSICA THOMAS AND JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student died early Friday morning and another was injured when their vehicle hit a tree on Beechwood Terrace near Claflin and Seth Childs roads.

Riley County Police Department Lt. Rodney Jager said at 12:16 a.m., the 1995 Camaro, driven by Jody Wick, sophomore in agribusiness, was traveling northbound on the 1400 block of Beechwood Terrace. The vehicle struck the curb on the east side of the street and continued along the curb for some time before it hit a tree in the front yard of 1436 Beechwood Terrace.

Wick and his passenger Christian Muck, sophomore in life sciences, were taken to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue. Muck was pronounced dead shortly after 2 a.m. Wick was treated for minor injuries and released.

Muck, 20, was the only passenger in the vehicle. He was found unconscious on the pavement near the passenger side door. Wick, 20, was conscious and walking when police arrived on the scene. According to the police report, Muck and Wick were not wearing seatbelts.

Duane Muck, Muck's father, said the victims were roommates at 1400 Chase Place, Apt. 7, along with former K-State student and high-jumper Nathan Leeper.

Wick was also a member of the K-State track team until recently.

Lodis Rodas, founder of Black Student Union, will speak at a banquet Saturday marking BSU's 30th anniversary. The banquet is one of many events that will take place during Black History Month.

"We expect a big turnout for Lodis Rodas — not only current BSU members, but black alumni as well. It is like a homecoming for BSU," said Dawnielle Robinson, coordinator of Multicultural Student Organizations.

"BSU members will have the opportunity to meet Lodis Rodas and find out what it was like to start BSU," said Brandon Clark, K-State BSU president.

The "continuing excellence" banquet will be at 6 p.m. Saturday in the Union Ballroom.

Lodis Rodas is not the only guest to come to K-State for Black History Month. Elaine Brown, the only woman to serve as head of the Black Panther Party, will speak at 7 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Little Theatre.

Denver Delight

Capturing his second ring, Elway finishes victoriously

By DAVE GOLDBERG

This was exactly why John Elway came back this season — to win a second Super Bowl.

It turned out so well, he may put his retirement plans on hold and come back for a third.

"I don't know. This definitely throws a kink into it," Elway said after completing 18 of 29 passes for 336 yards and winning his first Super Bowl MVP trophy in five starts, a record for a quarterback.

"This is what I came back for, to enjoy the Super Bowl. I'm going to savor this."

The final score was 34-19 over an Atlanta team that was its own worst enemy as the 38-year-old Elway got a measure of revenge against the Falcons' Dan Reeves, who coached him in three Super Bowl losses and left Denver in 1992 at odds with the quarterback. Denver coach Mike Shanahan also got some payback against Reeves, who fired him as offensive coordinator in 1991.

two 1-yard TD runs.

■ Terrell Davis, the league MVP, who carried 25 times for 102 yards for his seventh consecutive postseason 100-yard game, breaking an NFL record set by John Riggins.

■ Wide receiver Rod Smith, who caught five passes for 152 yards and an 80-yard touchdown.

Despite the absence of tight end Shannon Sharpe, who injured a knee in the first quarter, Smith and the other Denver receivers consistently burned Eugene Robinson.

All that helped Denver become the first team to win two straight Super Bowls since Dallas did in 1993 and 1994 and the first AFC team to win two straight since Pittsburgh won in 1979 and 1980.

Now they could become the first ever to win three straight.

"John is the Denver Broncos and he proved it tonight," receiver Ed McCaffrey said. "We'll all be nudging him to stick with us."

For all the Broncos did, the game turned on what the Falcons didn't do — getting only six points on their first six forays into Denver territory. Their first TD came on rookie Tim Dwight's 94-yard kickoff return with 11 minutes left in the game.

On the other opportunities, Jamal Anderson was dumped for a 2-yard loss on fourth and one from the Broncos 26, Morten Andersen missed a 28-yard field goal, and Chris Chandler threw an interception to Gordon.

In all, Chandler threw three interceptions, two picked off by Gordon, who also had two in the AFC championship game.

"The things we did well all year, we didn't do," said Reeves, who underwent quadruple heart bypass surgery six weeks ago.

"In the red zone we missed a field goal, a fourth-down attempt, two interceptions and settled for two field goals. You can't win if you can't score in the red zone."

The game turned on one of the Falcons' failures with five minutes left in the second quarter.

Atlanta moved to the Denver eight yard line, but couldn't convert on third and goal. Then Andersen, one of only two kickers with more than 400 career field goals, missed a 26-yard attempt.

On the next play, Smith raced by Ronnie Bradford and Robinson and caught the ball in stride for an 80-yard score that made it 17-3.

"We kept giving different looks inside the 20," Gordon said. "They got confused once they got inside there."

The Atlanta loss was the fourth defeat for Reeves as a Super Bowl coach, the first three with Denver in 1987, 1988 and 1990. In each of those games, he said, his teams played nowhere near their potential.

That certainly was true Sunday with the Falcons, who won the AFC West with a Sanitation concerns prompt end to recycling program

Concerns about food safety and sanitation have forced Dillons grocery store officials to discontinue the store's recycling program.

Neither of Manhattan's Dillons will accept aluminum or plastic for recycling after Feb. 17.

The decision to end the program was based on health concerns and the fact that several stores were receiving inappropriate items such as soiled diapers and medical waste.

"I cannot stress the importance of food safety and sanitation in our stores enough," Gaschler said. "Those are paramount concerns of ours. This was not an economic decision by any means."

He said there were no external pressures from health departments to make this decision, but that Dillons felt was in the best interests of the stores and their employees.

"After taking a look at the program over the past few months and seeing what our employees had to deal with, we felt it was time to make a change," Gaschler said. "There were already problems with the program, and there was a greater potential for more in the future."

Gaschler said the stores will be assisting those customers who wish to continue recycling through an in-store sign program. The signs will display the names and addresses of alternate sites that will accept aluminum and plastics.

Greg Wilson, owner of Howie's Recycling, said he expects an increase in business, but some of the increase would be unwanted.

"I do not necessarily want the increase in plastic, but I will accept it," he said. "The plastic is very bulky, labor intensive and there is no market for them. The aluminum, on the other hand, will always be welcome."

Gaschler said Dillons would continue its inter-produced cardboard recycling program. The stores recycle nearly 22 million pounds per year through that program.

Albanian disagreements hurt Kosovo peace process

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia — Only days before Kosovo Albanians were expected to talk peace with the Serbs, U.S. and British envoys were shuttling between hotel rooms, explaining conference plans to rival ethnic Albanians who wouldn't even sit together.

Beyond that common goal of independence for their Kosovo homeland, ethnic Albanian leaders are divided by deep personal and philosophical differences, petty rivalries and a desire for power.

The success of the international Kosovo peace conference, which the United States and five of the main European powers have called for Saturday, might depend largely on whether these groups can speak with a single voice in negotiations with the Serbs.

NATO has authorized Secretary-General Javier Solana to launch military action in Yugoslavia if the diplomatic initiative fails.

"There is considerable pressure now for them to unite, and it's not only coming from the international community but from inside the Albanian community as well," Veton Surroi, an influential ethnic Albanian journalist, told The Associated Press.

Independence from the Yugoslav republic of Serbia is a goal agreed on by most Kosovo Albanians, who form 90 percent of the province's 2 million people.

Mahmut Bakali, the former Communist Party president in Kosovo, said international pressure probably will lead the rivals to overcome their differences.

"There is no difference in the goal of independence," he said. "These rivalries are irrational."

Mystery solved: The AIDS virus came from chimps

CHICAGO — Scientists believe they have identified the origin of the AIDS virus.

It came from chimpanzees.

In a presentation Sunday, researchers from the University of Alabama at Birmingham said they have convincing proof the virus has spread on at least three separate occasions from chimpanzees to people in Africa. One of these cross-species transmissions was the start of the epidemic that now infects about 35 million people worldwide.

Chimps, which probably have carried the virus for hundreds of thousands of years, apparently do not get sick from it. Figuring out why could be important.

"This is excellent science with biological and virological importance. If we understood how the chimp has dealt with this infection over time, that could have implications for human medicine," said Dr. Kevin DeCock, an AIDS expert at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta.

While chimps have long been suspected as the source, "there have been a lot of loose ends that made people uncomfortable drawing that conclusion," Dr. Beatrice Hahn said.

Hahn made the case that this event almost certainly occurred in west equatorial Africa when someone caught the virus from a chimp, perhaps after killing the animal for food.

Forums focus on diversity

■ Monthly diversity events feature interaction between students, faculty.

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State offers a forum for diversity-related issues each month, using diversity dialogues in Hale Library.

The first meeting of this semester will be Thursday from 12:30 to 1:30 p.m. in the Hemisphere Room, on the fifth floor of Hale Library.

K-State Libraries' Multicultural Research and Resource Center and the American Ethnic Studies Program are co-sponsors of the dialogues.

The dialogues serve several purposes, said Todd Nicewonger, student development coordinator for the Department of American Ethnic Studies.

He said the dialogues provide a forum to share diverse perspectives, initiate interaction between K-State faculty and students, promote diversity at K-State and develop networks between multicultural organizations on campus.

Molly Roysse, coordinator of Multicultural Library Services, said the dialogues are informal and the topics of discussion include diversity in a general sense.

"The issues we discuss deal with all kinds of diversity, including racial, gender, religious and lifestyle differences," Roysse said. "We want it to be informal, so that students feel free to talk."

Both Nicewonger and Roysse said they felt the dialogues had been effective in the past by creating more awareness for diversity issues at K-State and creating a place where people interested in diversity issues can meet one another.

"One example of something that has happened as a result of the diversity dialogues is the Cesar E. Chavez observance week that is being planned for this March," Roysse said. "The idea for this event was a result of a dialogue discussion last spring."

About 30-40 people attend the dialogues each month, with a core group of about 20 regulars, Roysse said.

Nicewonger said that although the sponsors would like more students to be involved, there are usually more faculty in attendance.

"The ratios within the group change every time we meet," he said. "The faculty who come are pretty consistent, while our student numbers are not. Sometimes we have classes come in, and that will boost student attendance by 20 or so, though."

The dialogues are centered on a theme, but there is flexibility to go where conversation leads, Roysse said.

She said that February's discussion will center on an evaluation of the Martin Luther King Jr. observance. Participants will be encouraged to share opinions about the effectiveness of the events and ideas on how to improve other diversity events.

Also encouraged in Thursday's discussion will be ideas on how to build coalitions between different diversity-related organizations so more people are aware of what is happening on campus, Roysse said.

Nicewonger, who is also the facilitator for the dialogues this year, said discussion techniques are used to help students share more openly and make the dialogues more effective.

"We usually start the dialogues with large group discussion, but we frequently break into rap sessions or smaller groups that help students feel more comfortable sharing their opinions," he said.

New additions to the dialogues this semester are information tables to help different multicultural organizations connect with each other and provide information about activities and events to other students, Roysse said. The tables will be set up for students to browse and pick up information during the dialogues and for 15 minutes before and after the discussion.

"The information area is a wonderful opportunity to get information about important diversity-related events out to students and faculty," Nicewonger said. "This is all about linking the voices of students and faculty to help promote diversity more effectively at K-State."

Beverly Jack, 13, Riley, Kan., shoots pool in the K-State Student Union early Sunday morning as part of the K-State Spectacular. The event was coordinated by the Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity as a way to give youths something to do on a Saturday night. Events included: tennis, volleyball, basketball, swimming, a disc jockey, bowling and pool.

Less than Spectacular

The first K-State Spectacular, a youth event coordinated by the Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity, was Saturday night at Ahearn Field House and the K-State Student Union.

Although the event was publicized through radio commercials and fliers, the turnout was less than expected. At 11 p.m., about 20 to 30 youths were on hand.

Bob Hedley, senior district executive of the Boy Scouts of America, said he got the idea for the event from a recent article in The Manhattan Mercury that discussed the need for an activity for community youth.

"We thought that this would be great for the winter because there are more activities that you can do indoors," Hedley said.

Jennifer Whitlock, senior in animal science, was the chairwoman of the committee.

"We began planning this last semester, in mid-November," she said.

She said the most difficult part in organizing the event was calling people and getting permission to use the facilities.

A disc jockey played music while youth played volleyball and tennis on the indoor courts in Ahearn.

Prizes donated by area businesses were also given away throughout the night. Several K-State athletes were in attendance, including Kelle Branting and Kim Zschau, members of the volleyball team, who were on hand to sign autographs for participants.

Paul Visser and Brandon Coyle, both 15, Wakefield, were enjoying the pool facilities.

"We came here for the pool. Winter kills us," Visser said.

Visser and Coyle are members of the Focus youth group in Wakefield. The group is non-denominational, but is an outreach program of the United Methodist Church, Bridget Colp, leader of the group, said.

"We heard about the event through a flier that we got from the Boy Scouts of America," she said. "We just came here to have a good time."

Kenny Hinrichsen, junior in architecture and member of Alpha Phi Omega, agreed.

"A part of our organization is service to the community," he said. "This is just a way to help out all the kids and have fun doing it."

Group hopes for sensitive graduates

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tilford Group members discussed racial and diversity awareness at a group retreat Friday in the Hale Library Hemisphere Room.

The K-State Tilford Group is a branch of the Tilford Conference, which meets yearly to discuss multicultural issues. It created the K-State branch more than a year ago after seeing a need for an organization to prepare students for a global and diverse work force. The group consists of faculty members and some graduate students.

The retreat was designed to establish Tilford's goals and objectives. Juanita McGowan, director of American Ethnic Studies and facilitator of the Tilford Group, said it is time for the group to move ahead to the next level.

"We finally know what we're all about and where we want to go with our efforts," McGowan said. "We're organized and we're ready to go public and let people know what we're trying to do."

The group hopes to develop a curriculum that will make every K-State graduate sensitive to race relations. McGowan said students cannot develop a complete awareness by only attending class.

"No one can develop all these qualities in a classroom setting," she said. "Students need to be involved in extracurricular activities and experience things beyond the classroom to fully understand how to function in a global society."

No other university has taken the same strides as K-State in creating an environment where students can learn to deal with diversity, said Todd Nicewonger, graduate student and assistant to McGowan.

"In a way, it's ground breaking and innovative and exciting," Nicewonger said. "The future indicates that graduates from this university will need to be interculturally competent."

Tilford chose to look toward Gandhi's words for its new slogan: "You must be the change you wish to see in the world."

In April, 10 companies will send their diversity coordinators and trainers to K-State to attend a conference. The companies will meet with Tilford members to discuss ways and means of teaching students and employees how to relate to a changing and growing work environment in a racially sensitive community.

Provost James Coffman said everyone should work to become more culturally aware.

"Tilford is devoted to ways to enhance the total student experience," Coffman said. "Kansas is rapidly becoming an incredibly diverse place and everyone needs to realize this."

COLLEGIATE CALENDARS

PRESENTS

THE 1999 MEN & WOMEN OF K-STATE CALENDARS

In life there are difficult questions that everyone must eventually come face to face with. Whether or not to enter and be apart of the Men or Women of K-State Calendar contests shouldn't be one of them. Here are some of the reasons why we think you should.

1999 will mark the year that the Men and Women of K-State Calendars and contests make four exciting and fun additions. Thanks to the generosity of the fine people at Ramada Inn, the models will be transported, via private charter, to Glenwood Springs, Colorado for a four day photoshoot. Glenwood Springs is nestled in the Colorado Rocky Mountains between Vail and Aspen, two of the country's hottest ski resorts. There, the models will be treated to the time of their lives. "Lots of activities have been planned, such as a guys against girls formula one go-cart race and an evening of lounging in Glenwood's famous heated springs. I would go into more detail, but I don't want to give it all away. If people want to know all of the fun things that they could do, then they will have to enter the contests," said Bill Price, president of Collegiate Calendars.

For the first time ever, a national model search company will be brought in to help instruct all of the contestants on run way competition. J.J. Meier, president of Facefinders, will be flown in from California to attend the contestant meetings on February 21 at the Wareham Theatre. "This is being done to add a touch of professionalism to this years contests. In the past people have believed that dancing is one of the criteria needed to make the calendars. Mrs. Meier will instruct each contestant on how to walk out onto the stage with an air of confidence" stated Dave Lewis, director of sales and distribution for Collegiate Calendars. One point that Mr. Lewis emphasized was that the addition of Mrs. Meier is to make the contests more fair for everyone who participates, not to make them more difficult. Another improvement that Meiers brings with her is the ability to revamp the judging system currently used to select the calendar models. "The way that we have chosen the finalists in the past was always fair, but has grown outdated. This year Meiers will help Collegiate Calendars design a new judging system, as well as train all of the people who will judge this years contests. Afterall, the most important aspect of the contests is that the judges know how to judge accurately" said Price.

The final addition comes from two Manhattan based clothing stores. The Tux Shoppe will provide the tux's for the mens' formal wear rounds, while Dillard's provides the dresses for the womens' formal wear rounds of the competitions. Times will be arranged for each contestant to go to the stores and decide what they want to wear for the night that they compete.

Want to learn more about the contests? You have three options. First, pick up an entry form at any sponsoring Aggieville business, fill it out, and then return it. You will then get an informational packet that goes over everything in detail. Secondly, call the Collegiate Calendar office at 539-2166. Finally, you can attend the contestant meetings on Feb. 21 at the Wareham at 2 p.m. for the men and 4 p.m. for the women.

Teachers unprepared for today's classrooms

The numbers should be startling — 80 percent of U.S. teachers say they are not ready to teach in today's classrooms.

The reasons include a lack of adequate training in areas such as technology, special education and teaching bilingual children.

Teachers are not necessarily to blame for the shortcomings. U.S. Secretary of Education Richard Riley pointed a finger at both teacher education programs and school districts for not addressing the realities found in today's classrooms.

There is a tendency in schools to hire teachers with a broad amount of knowledge so they can teach more subjects and fill in where the school is most inadequate. However, problems arise when districts try to stretch a person's abilities beyond what they actually are. For example, some high schools will try to use a biology teacher to teach all of the sciences.

Universities try to combat this by offering broad education to those who are trying to teach. There is a fine line between being well rounded and being spread too thin. Knowledge in many subjects might make a teacher more valuable in the job market but less valuable in the classroom.

It's a tough task for school districts, especially in smaller communities, to hire only those teachers who are specialized to teach specific subjects. These survey results should act as a wake-up call for districts to realize the limitations of their teachers. If educators are going to teach subjects they only have a passing knowledge of, or if educators are going to deal with bilingual children, then the district should provide those teachers with adequate training.

Training also should be provided to allow teachers to learn how to use technology effectively in the classroom. Riley was quoted as saying, "One-shot workshops ... carry little relevance to teachers' work in the classroom." If training is going to be helpful, it must be intensive and relevant to the teacher's curriculum.

Universities must also look at the survey results and alter their methods so future teachers are prepared to enter classrooms that are becoming increasingly diverse. Although it's important to understand how classrooms work today, it is more important that teachers understand how they will work tomorrow.

Over the last couple of weeks there have been praises and approvals, but also disagreement about the new Wildcat 91.9 radio station. I think this could be taken care of pretty easily. Have modern rock until 7 p.m. Then from 7 until 10 have urban. Then from 10 until 1 a.m. have specialty shows. Then go back to modern rock again.

I like the DB92 new programming. It gives us something else to listen to besides the Lazer.

I just want to congratulate you all on the excellent job of new programming for DB92. It reminds me of the Lazer in Lawrence, and that's exactly what we've needed here. Thank you.

The changeover of DB92 just goes to reveal many hidden perspectives, attitudes and opinions that are not accepted in society. There should always be a variety of music on the radio, but as I flip through the stations, there's only country, rock 'n' roll and alternative. There's a lot wrong with this picture.

When did K-State become a segregated school when campus organizations do not have a voice in what is played on a campus radio station? This is just to get the black voice heard on the radio, not necessarily to take over the entire station. I do believe they should have an opinion on what is played.

OUR VIEW: an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

I hear that Dick Gregory, keynote speaker for the Martin Luther King Jr. Observance, said something about having more integrity in his big toe than K-State has, and how people got a bit upset. People called him crass. People called him immature and childish. He was criticized for corrupting some children who supposedly have not heard a dirty word or an opinionated thought in their whole lives. I didn't go see the speech, so I really couldn't understand fully the disgust that many seemed to have with the man. However, I have been listening to the new KSDB-FM 91.9, and I think I'm starting to understand how they felt. I'm marveling at how one person can be crass, and all hell is raised loose. But a radio station can be crass all the time, and we mark it off as a college radio station designed for a bunch of crass students. I really love the word crass.

First of all, let me say that I like some of the changes that have been made to the station. I like most of what they're playing now, but I do see how some listeners might be upset that their favorite music genres have been cut out of the program.

Getting back to the real issue at hand, I'm concerned about many of the sound bites that our campus radio station plays between songs and announcements that are and are not commercials.

Many thought Gregory should have been more adultlike, setting a good example of how an adult acts and thinks. They also thought his sense of humor was a little bit crass.

"It's not the size of your tower. It's how you use it," a woman having an asthma attack breathes onto the radio, sexual connotations spilling everywhere. A "South Park" sound bite features Cartman commenting on a gay dog doing something to another dog's "ass." A man urinates, and we hear him taking the Christian god's name in vain. Oh my. A stereotypical country redneck talks of "hog-tying" and "whooping" someone's "ass." At about 2 p.m. on Tuesday, Jan. 26, a few of K-State's finest young men giggle about the pope's visit with President Clinton and about passing Monica Lewinsky around a room of men like she's the whore to be used by the men with the power.

I laughed at the heck the first time. It was a pretty absurd thing to hear on the radio.

Now, all the clips are getting on my nerves and making me a bit upset. Perhaps right now you're thinking that I'm overreacting again, that I'm making nothing into something, that I can't take a joke and that I'm trying to ruin all the fun.

OK. This station is broadcast all over Manhattan and elsewhere, which means that kids are probably out there listening to this as well. I'm right about this; you can't deny it.

If Dick Gregory was crass, what would you call this? If we don't want Gregory speaking to a small percentage of the campus and community, then do we want such immature humor representing the campus and being listened to by the community? If we want to show Gregory that he was wrong, and that we do have more integrity than his toe can hold, then what do we want to be putting out on the airwaves?

Maybe I should just shut up, and we should continue with the programming. This time, let's talk about passing a respected woman like Elizabeth Dole around the room, continue using the word "ass" at the drop of a hat, continue acting like third-graders who giggle when someone mentions peeing, continue extending the view of K-State as a school of rednecks, and continue insulting the homosexuals who share our campus and community by turning gay sex into a laughing matter.

I've never heard a radio station with sound clips this extreme and annoying. Do we really need this to get people to listen?

If you're rolling your eyes at my disgust, just think about how you would define crass, what made Dick Gregory crass, and whether our radio station's sound bites or the words of Dick Gregory fit your definition.

I'm all for humor. I hope you all know that I do have a sense of humor. I just don't want to have this kind of humor representing my school. I'd rather have more announcements than listen to a man obsess about the size of his penis, listen to someone urinate, and listen to a bunch of smarmy boys talk about human beings like they are pieces of meat.

What individuals find humorous is a reflection on the kind of people they are. Do we want the people of the community to judge the 20,000 students of K-State by this kind of humor?

Natural family planning offers another alternative

Editor,

I am writing in response to Tom Clarke's column in Thursday's Collegian. His point is well-taken that there is an increasing problem of overpopulation around the world. But his column is riddled with errors and misrepresentations. First, while he correctly stated that the population is growing in Third World countries, the population actually is shrinking in the developed nations of the world, such as the United States. This is the reason we are not seeing strong national support for population-reduction plans. Cultural trends in our country toward smaller families have solved our population problems.

As a Roman Catholic, I also take issue with his characterization of the pope's opinions on birth control as being "an act of supreme irresponsibility." His position (as well as that of the Catholic Church) is not, as he stated, against family planning. Neither is the Catholic Church "the main impediment to any discussion of population control." Rather, the Catholic Church is against artificial methods of contraception such as condoms and birth control pills.

The Catholic Church advocates natural family planning. This is not having sex whenever you want and leaving the results up to God, and neither is it the old rhythm method. This method is based on observing changes in the consistency of vaginal mucus and temperature. This allows a woman to accurately determine the timing of ovulation and thus avoid sex during the fertile period (or have sex if pregnancy is desired). This method can be extremely effective. A five-minute search of the Internet yielded the following quote:

A recent but typical study found "... natural family planning can be extremely effective in the Third World. The study was of 19,843 predominantly poor women in Calcutta.... The pregnancy rate was similar to that with the combined contraceptive pill — 0.2 pregnancies/100 women users yearly." (British Medical Journal, Sept. 18, 1993, by R.E.J. Ryder.)

This method is free of any drug side effects, and, once the method is learned, virtually cost-free. This is of particular interest in Third World countries, because effective artificial contraception might be out of reach because of cost. What is needed is a massive education effort to inform people in the Third World about this method, not a campaign to put everyone on the pill.

Football players should support fellow athletes

Editor,

As I stood cheering the men's basketball team to victory Saturday, Jan. 23, I noticed something that disturbed me. There was one part of a section that did not cheer when the Cats made a basket or when the opposing team was at the free-throw line. They just sat there like they didn't want to be there. You wouldn't have known that they were K-State students since only one or two of them were wearing purple, except for the fact they all stood to come on the court at half-time to be recognized. The so-called "fans" in this section were K-State football team members. I thought the football team deserved to be recognized for their incredible season. I clapped when they called off all the names of the All-Americans and other outstanding players. In fact, I was probably more excited than most of them.

I guess the thing that bothers me most was the lack of support the football team showed for the men's basketball team. I was at the pep rally in San Antonio when the team captains stood at the microphone and told the huge crowd to keep cheering them on when they were on the field, because that is important and keeps the men's basketball team feels the same way? How would the football team feel if one of the sections closest to the field was filled with their peers and they just sat there emotionless and unenthusiastic? How can the football team expect us to cheer them on and support them when they do not return that same support for other athletic teams? I truly believe that it is important for all student-athletes to support one another.

I am not going to boycott next year's football games because of the overall attitude of the team Saturday. I just wanted the football players who attended the game Saturday to know how disappointed and angry some of their fans were.

Groundhog Day unimpressive; squirrels deserve more respect

Tuesday's the big day. It's the day when school-children go to bed early in anticipation of rising with the dawn, sliding down the bannister, and slamming their face against the window to see if HE has arrived.

That's right, it's Brent Spiner's birthday. Tuesday, Lt. Commander Data from "Star Trek: The Next Generation" turns a hale and hearty ...

No, wait. It's also Groundhog Day.

Yes, Groundhog Day, the idiot stepchild of holidays true and proper. From the inner circle of religious holidays like Christmas and Easter to the cultural holidays of Thanksgiving and Independence Day, even including the multicultural pull of Cinco de Mayo and Kwanzaa, there has to be a bottom rung of "holidays," days called such only because there's something scribbled in tiny type at the bottom of the calendar entry. People can observe Groundhog Day — any yokel can reach into a hole or similar habitat and forcefully extract a large furry rodent — but does anyone, even in the state of Pennsylvania, actually celebrate it? Is there a rack of Groundhog Day cards underneath the red-and-white heart-shaped nightmare that has bred on the local greeting card display?

Could it be that Hallmark has missed a prime opportunity by synthesizing justification for sending cards (Surrogate Mothers' Day, Vegetarians' Day, Inner-Ear-Imbalance Day) when it could've simply commercialized a preexisting, heretofore unappreciated holiday?

Well, no, because, let's face it, even given the shoddy justification most holidays have, Groundhog Day is lamer than most, if not all. Thanksgiving is a feast recognizing the cooperation between European settlers and the indigenous American population before the former started marching across the continent, salivating with manifest destiny. Valentine's Day commemorates people subjected to extreme suffering, from execution to imprisonment, for their love — so at least that theme continues. Groundhog Day, though, is a holiday that must make foreign populations point at America and fall down laughing.

Think about it. A huge rodent ambles out of its home one morning, and whether it sees its shadow is somehow indicative of the prevalent weather patterns for the rest of the winter? Could this possibly have made more sense before Doppler radar and weather satellites? Is anyone going to question the meteorological integrity of this furry, buck-toothed Willard Scott? Is America just hard-up for a holiday between Martin Luther King Jr. Day and Valentine's Day?

This inane ritual somehow justifies the gallons and gallons of ink spilled on calendars everywhere to mark the second day of February to be Groundhog Day. Look, jerking overgrown hamsters out of the ground and waving them around in the often-frigid early morning doesn't justify anything more than animal-endangerment charges. I'm not convinced it even deserves capital letters. I just asked the copy chief.

"Groundhog Day," I announce. "Yes," she says, steeling herself for whatever I'm going to follow that with. She's handled some pretty bizarre non sequiturs from me.

"Do we capitalize it?"

There is a short but distinct pause. "Yes," she insists.

"Why?" I ask.

"Because it's a holiday," she tells me, with absolutely no sense of conviction, in that "just because" tone that mothers take with their children. And that's the end of the debate on that issue.

I hate seeing the day on the calendar and not being able to properly celebrate it. I need that excuse. "Sorry, doc, Marxist literary theory's all well and good, but dammit, today's Groundhog Day! Come with me and carpe diem! It comes but once a year! You'll have a pint, I'll have a milk and we'll tell our children of these days in the primes of our lives!" Y'know, it never works, but it's always worth a try.

While I've not done an active census of the groundhog population, I don't think the numbers are there to justify fully implementing the holiday in Kansas. We could use stuffed groundhogs on little spring-loaded mechanisms activated by timers, so that at the crack of dawn, springing up they bounce out of their holes. But that's pretty sad. We could use cows, but even if they did decide to leave their barns (I can't see cows burrowing) at the crack of dawn, they probably wouldn't even notice their shadows. Cows are like that.

I propose, in lieu of Groundhog Day, that K-State celebrate Squirrel Day. They aren't that far removed from groundhogs, except that they're about 90 pounds lighter and move like weasels on speed. Squirrels will be excited about having Squirrel Day — squirrels are excited about damn near everything. Perhaps that enthusiasm can carry over into our lives, so that every Feb. 2 will become a day of fervent activity and unbridled energy. We can even commercialize it. "Maxwell House and Java bring you Squirrel Day! Free coffee all morning. Surge in the afternoon, Pixie Stix in every classroom!"

Then, two days later, we'd all be able to close our eyes again.

Council member supports $1.70 library privilege fee

Editor,

I am writing in response to the editorial regarding the fee proposal for library acquisitions that appeared in Tuesday's Collegian. I disagree with the opinion presented by the Collegian. I believe Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock's proposal of a $1.70 per-credit-hour privilege fee increase for library acquisitions is a fair and reasonable request that should be supported by the student body. Let me explain why.

I work for New Student Services, a campus office that deals primarily with recruiting prospective students. During a recent scholarship day, a prospective scholar student approached one of my colleagues with an interesting question. The student wanted to know why K-State was not ranked in the top-100 universities in a poll he had read.

I have a sneaking suspicion the status of our library might be a culprit. Our library system, despite the recent completion of the extraordinary Hale Library, remains at the bottom of the Big 12 Conference. We have the only library in the conference that does not qualify as a member of the Association of Research Libraries. The number of books our library purchases has dropped from about 20,000 10 years ago to about 7,000 last year because of rising costs and insufficient funds. Journal subscriptions also are suffering considerably.

I do not believe the proposal is a "punishment" to the students as the Collegian suggested. The proposal only asks for the students to match the contributions of the state and the university for next year. While funds from these sources will increase every year, the privilege fee will not increase unless the students elect to raise it. By 2003, student funds will account for less than 20 percent of the acquisition funds needed under Hobrock's proposal. I believe this is more than a fair compromise, not "ridiculous," as the Collegian suggested. There are five other Big 12 schools with library fees in excess of $2 per credit hour, with Texas A&M topping the list at more than $5 per credit hour.

Some have suggested that funds for the library should be institutionalized through the Kansas Board of Regents. This, however, most likely will translate into higher tuition. Why not keep the funds in the privilege fee, where students can control them in the Student Senate?

Although K-State is not ranked among the top-100 universities, it is still one of the top-100 best buys in the nation. Maybe there should be a little more balance between cost and quality. After all, you do get what you pay for, right? We are paying for a library that ranks about 140th in the nation. I think we can do better.

I support Hobrock's proposal, and I urge the Privilege Fee Committee to do so as well. Should Student Senate choose to place the proposal on the ballot as a referendum, I would urge the student body to support it as well. I take great pride in K-State and am more than willing to give $40 a year to make it the best it can be. I think we would all do well to take Tracey Mann's suggestion in letting Dr. William Love's recent $1 million gift to the library serve as an inspiration and a lesson in giving for us all.

Columnist 'way off base' on Catholic family planning

Editor,

I'd like to take the opportunity to respond to the column written by Tom Clarke in Thursday's Collegian.

Tom, your view of the Catholic Church's position on family planning is way off base. You wrote in your column that the church is opposed to family planning. You clearly didn't do your research on church doctrine. It is a strongly recognized fact among fellow Catholics that the church holds a high regard for Natural Family Planning, and workshops on the subject are offered all over the world. In required pre-marriage planning classes in the Catholic Church, the couple preparing for their marriage is sometimes also required to attend these workshops. They include lectures, literature and one-on-one help determining the routine of the female partner's menstrual cycle. Abstinence is taught through the fertile period of the cycle, thus preventing unwanted pregnancies. This method is also great in planning pregnancy. When the couple is ready for children to be added to the mix, they usually can conceive quickly using the same method, except that the rules of abstinence are switched so that you abstain during the time the woman is not fertile.

Now if that's not family planning, explain to me just what is. The next time you decide to write a scathing column outlining Catholic Church doctrine and beliefs, take a trip to St. Isidore's University Chapel up the road and introduce yourself to the priest, and you just might learn something.

Instead of worrying about the different contraceptives available, why not teach abstinence. If you can't practice a little self-control once in a while, you have no business taking part in the mature act of sexual intercourse. The people in those overpopulated Third World countries need to make the connection that sex equals babies. It's not that hard to figure out, and it's certainly not the pope's place to have to make that notion clear. Get a clue and keep it zipped unless you're ready for the consequences.

Program director wants time for station to succeed

Editor,

I would like to address concerns regarding the new programming at KSDB-FM 91.9 that have been brought to my attention via the Collegian Fourum Line.

On Jan. 11, I and a staff of 14 students took control of the previously university-controlled station. My staff and I are the first all-student staff to run 91.9. As students in journalism, we are seeking a true laboratory experience in broadcast journalism, not only for the 15 students programming the station, but for the on-air broadcasters who operate the station.

I alone do not choose the programming at KSDB, although I do chair the executive staff that is responsible for the programming decisions.

Many factors, including the research of professional stations in a similar environment to our own, influenced our decision to create a consistent, popular format. The objective of the student station is to create an environment where the participants will be able to enter the work force with the skills and the general knowledge of how to run a broadcast facility. Ska still is played, urban still is played, and soon you will hear a variety of talk shows and a more comprehensive mix of music. The schedule might not be convenient for you as an individual; however, it is a proven model and the research done this semester will tell us whether we have succeeded. Until the research is done, we will not know, but we deserve the chance to find out.

We started this experiment in broadcast journalism only two weeks ago, and I only can ask for patience as we clean up the mess that was left for us.

Accident injures 2 K-State baseball players as car flips on I-70

By BRIAN HERNANDEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two K-State baseball players were involved in a one-car accident early Friday morning on Interstate 70.

The driver, junior Travis Andre', was charged with DUI and no proof of insurance. The passenger, senior Andy Silva, was transported by Riley County EMS to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue in Manhattan for treatment of facial injuries.

Silva then was transferred to KU

Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan., at 12:30 p.m. Friday to undergo surgery for his injuries. Hospital officials said Silva was in fair condition following the 1 1/2 hour surgery. He was released Sunday afternoon.

The Geary County Sheriff's Department said Andre's 1990 Eagle Talon was traveling westbound on I-70 at 2:30 a.m. According to police reports, Andre' fell asleep while operating the vehicle, and the car swerved off the roadway.

The report said he then woke up and tried to get back on the highway, but he then lost control of the vehicle. The car flipped and rolled, then landed on its roof near milepost 314 on I-70. Both Andre' and Silva were wearing their seat belts.

Andre' was not seriously injured and is free on bond. The sheriff's department said Andre' could face a fine, a jail sentence, the loss of his license for up to one year, or any combination of the three if found guilty of the charges.

The case has been handed over to the Geary County District Court, which will determine any penalties Andre' will face.

Head coach Mike Clark said the two players were returning from Topeka, but said he had no idea why they were there or what they might have been doing. He said there will be some sort of punishment imposed but has not yet had time to decide what it will be.

"We will take a look at what happened and decide on action from there," Clark said. "All disciplinary action will be handled internally."

Silva, both a relief pitcher and an outfielder for the Wildcats, was a second-team All-Big 12 selection as a reliever following last season. He led the Big 12 with eight saves and posted a 3-1 record with a 2.66 ERA. He hit .291 with a pair of home runs and 18 RBIs in 51 games in the K-State outfield. Clark said the South Gate, Calif., native is expected to miss the first five to six weeks of the season due to the injuries sustained in the accident.

Andre', from Greeley, Colo., transferred from the University of Florida this past summer. He was expected to compete for a starting spot at third base this season.

Both Andre' and Silva were unavailable for interviews.

PREDICTING a new Beginning

Cats look to end KU streak at Bramlage

BY

Every year, one game takes precedence over all others on the K-State men's basketball schedule. For this game, Wildcat faithful pack Bramlage Coliseum, players get more pumped and K-State alumni hope for the best.

Tonight, K-State will attempt to win against its intrastate rival, the 20th-ranked Kansas Jayhawks in front of a nationally televised audience on ESPN's Big Monday. Tipoff is at 8:30 p.m.

"Our guys are a little more energized prior to the KU game," head coach Tom Asbury said. "I would think we would have a better mind-set. Large crowds help significantly. They energize and help the performance of the team."

Going into the KU game, K-State has a record of 14-7 overall and 3-5 in the conference. The team looks to rebound from a 70-63 defeat last Wednesday to Missouri. Before that loss, the Wildcats had won two straight Big 12 Conference games, including a 66-51 drubbing of Oklahoma.

Despite these victories, the Cats have yet to climb out of eighth place in the Big 12 standings.

"We really could use a win to get back in the standings," senior guard-forward Josh Reid said. "Kansas hasn't been as dominant as they have been. They have more of a balanced attack this year."

KU, with a record of 14-6 overall and 6-2 in the conference, won its last game at home Saturday against Colorado, after losing to Missouri and Nebraska.

The Jayhawks, who lost first-team All-Americans Raef LaFrentz and Paul Pierce to the NBA draft, are led by 7-foot sophomore center Eric Chenoweth and senior guard Ryan Robertson.

Chenoweth averages 14.1 points and nine rebounds a game, and Robertson is averaging 12.4 points.

"They don't have any All-Americans this year, but they are still a very good team," freshman forward Travis Reynolds said.

"We're a very good team, too. If we play with a lot of poise, we will be OK. If we can slow down their offensive game, we will be successful."

The outcome of the matchup might hinge on rebounding, which the Wildcats lead the league in.

Shawn Rhodes said in order to be effective against KU, the Wildcats must play strong defense and not get beat by the Jayhawks' strong shooters.

"With KU, we have to get back and eliminate their fast-break points," he said. "We have to find those good shooters they have in the transitions. That's how they get a lot of their points."

With the Jayhawks already having lost more games this season than all of last season, Asbury said this season they haven't been as dominant as in years past.

"KU has been better than us in the past," he said. "There is not a whole lot we can do about it. It's in the past. Everyone has to feel better about this year's matchups. I still think they are a good ballclub, but they're beatable."

Asbury said the Wildcats have been plagued by inconsistency and that they must play their hardest the rest of the season.

"We shouldn't be quite so erratic," he said. "I haven't had that level of consistency with this team. I'm not sure what we are going to get every night. Every game is crucial for us. We're going to have to make up some distance. There is a tremendous sense of urgency. We've got to get after it. We better start playing every game here on out. Every game."

Players, fans hope to start new streak

Jan. 17, 1994. A date that joy, happiness, sadness, and depression all were stirred in K-State fans.

It was the last time the Wildcats were able to defeat their most hated rivals, the Kansas Jayhawks.

Thirteen straight times the Cats have fallen at the hands of the Jayhawks. The streak spans more than five years. Several times the Wildcats have come close but could not make the play down the stretch to earn a victory over the Hawks. K-State's next chance to end the streak will come in an 8:30 game tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

The K-State players and coaching staff said they have heard the grumbings of fans who would rather have the Cats beat KU than win any other game of the season.

"You'd be surprised how people have personal agendas," head coach Tom Asbury said. "Obviously the largest agenda is to beat KU, and we hear that."

Different fans offer different reasons as to why the Wildcats haven't been able to conquer KU in the past 13 meetings, but Asbury offered just one.

"Since I've been here, KU has been better than we are, end of conversation," Asbury said.

The last time K-State was better than KU was in 1994. The Dana Altman-coached Cats beat the Jayhawks, 68-64, in Lawrence.

Those were the days of the "Cardiac Cats," who were led by three seniors — shooting guard Askia Jones, point guard Anthony Beane and center Deryl Cunningham. That team finished the year 20-14, mostly on the shooting of Jones, who lit up Fresno State for a Big 8-record 62 points as the Cats reached the NIT Final Four.

Senior center Shawn Rhodes has faced KU eight times in his collegiate career, and he has at least two more chances this season, but he said he refuses to let the streak bother him.

"We don't really talk about the streak," Rhodes said. "We do sort of talk about the games that we've been here for. We can't control the years before that."

Junior forward Josh Reid said he hoped the number of days of the streak will stop adding up after tonight's game.

"I've played two years as a part of the streak, and that's something that we hope to overcome this year so we can get that monkey off our back," Reid said.

With the graduation of Raef LaFrentz, and Paul Pierce skipping his senior year to play in the NBA, KU lost the two focal points of its offense.

"They don't have those one or two definite scorers; they have a more balanced attack," Reid said.

"This year, we have a great deal more experience than in years past — at least as much if not more than KU has. I really think that's going to be an advantage for us."

K-State has jumped out ahead of KU several times during the streak, but always has slowed down, and gone on to lose the game.

"We're going to have to go out and control our emotions," freshman forward Travis Reynolds said. "KU is a good team, but we're a very good team, too."

"This year, the streak's going to end."

K-State's Ayome May (center) battles for a rebound with Kansas' Paul Pierce (left) and Eric Chenoweth during second-half action in a game at Bramlage Coliseum last year. Kansas defeated K-State 73-58.

STEVE HEBERT/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Robertson leads solid KU back court

The Kansas Jayhawks will feature a balanced back-court attack tonight as they bring four players with guard play under their belt.

Senior Ryan Robertson is the most experienced in the back court but has switched this season from point guard to shooting guard, a position he has little experience at.

He averages 12.7 points per game for the Hawks.

The newest member of the Jayhawk squad is 6-foot, 1-inch freshman Jeff Boschee.

He has emerged as a solid point guard for KU, averaging 10.1 points per contest and leading the team in assists with 4.1 per game.

ROBERTSON

"I think that their guard play is really pretty good," K-State head coach Tom Asbury said Friday.

"I know they may not feel that way," he said.

"I think Boschee and Robertson are really very fine players. They really have to do a nice job."

Sophomore Kenny Gregory and junior Nick Bradford play both the forward and guard positions for the Hawks.

Gregory and Bradford both average in double figures in scoring with 12.6 and 10.3 points per game, respectively.

Asbury said he isn't concerned with matching up against the Jayhawks, despite the solid combination of Robertson and Boschee in the back court.

"Matchups aren't that big of a deal because we play so many guys," Asbury said.

"Who we're going to put on so-and-so rarely has an effect on the game. What matters is how people are going to come out and play well."

This year's basketball team can write new ending to same old losing story

VIEWPOINT

Chris McLemore

It's a tale of two cities.

Literally. It's a tale of two basketball teams headed in opposite directions.

It's a tale of a game that can make a season for one team and ruin the ranking of another.

It's the story of a game that in any other year would be over before it began.

But this year the story is different. This year the outcome is not predetermined. This year the ending has yet to be written. This year there are questions, chances and whispered hopes of new possibilities.

This year the home team has a chance to be the victor.

When the K-State Wildcats step onto their court tonight to face the KU Jayhawks, they'll be looking to pen a positive ending to this year's chapter of a century-old story.

The Wildcats will be looking to get their first win against KU since 1994. The Wildcats are hoping for the same ending that they hope for every year, only this year the story isn't just a fairy tale.

It's an ending that the Nebraska Cornhuskers have shown to be a real possibility. On Wednesday, the Cornhuskers became only the second conference team to beat KU since the formation of the Big 12 Conference.

Tonight, K-State will be looking to become team No. 3.

The Wildcats are coming off of a disheartening loss to Keyon Dooling (his teammates played a little too) at Missouri.

KU is coming off of a week that saw it lose at home to Missouri, lose at Nebraska and beat lowly Colorado with a last-second three-point shot.

But tonight's game is going to be different for both teams. This is the game that fans look forward to all year. This is a game that actually will fill up Bramlage Coliseum. This is a game that even ESPN will be sitting in on.

Oh, sure. We've seen this hype before.

This is the year's biggest game every year. This is always the one game that fans rally behind. This is always the biggest let-down of the season.

Only this time, the men in crimson will be the ones who have everything on the line. They are on their heels, and they can't afford to let this game get away from them.

This game has all their records on the line. It is for a chance to stay in the polls and stay in the Big 12 race. This is a game the Jayhawks simply cannot lose, but that outcome is all too possible.

The Wildcats will be ready. They know what this game can mean to their fans and to their program. They know they can win this game and they can win it big. They know they have played tough with every ranked team they have faced this season.

They know they almost beat Clemson, they should have beat Indiana and Oklahoma State, and they did beat Oklahoma. They know Manny Dies can still play with intensity and desire. They know Tony Kitt can pull down rebounds from anywhere on the court. They know Josh Reid can hit three pointers with eyes closed. They know Chris Griffin, Cortez Groves and Shawn Rhodes can come alive in the big games.

They know the Jayhawks will be running scared.

When the Jayhawks trot onto the court, you won't see the unstoppable force we are all so used to seeing. You won't see seasoned veterans who are playing the game as a mere formality. You will see a team lacking confidence. You will see a young team. You will see fear, concern and uncertainty.

When the Wildcats arrive, the look will be different. They will be rested and ready. They will be confident, and they will be focused.

This isn't going to be the same old story. This is going to be a new chapter for K-State. We won't see the same old humiliating defeat. We are going to see a hard-fought battle as the Wildcats take one step forward in the Big 12 and the Jayhawks take one step back.

We're going to see the realization of a fantasy that we've had for so long.

This is definitely the tale of two cities, only this time the ending will be a new one.

Wildcats lose to rival KU, continue road woes

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team's road troubles continued Sunday against No. 23 KU.

The Cats lost to rival KU 66-45 as the inside play of Jayhawk forwards Lynn Pride and Brooke Reeves was too much to overcome.

K-State was looking to bounce back from a disappointing loss Wednesday against Texas A&M. The loss drops the Cats to 4-5 in conference play and 11-8 overall.

Meanwhile, the Jayhawks entered the game with the momentum of an 18-game home winning streak and were looking to maintain their national ranking.

In the first half, the Jayhawks defense frustrated K-State as it shot just 32 percent from the field and committed 11 turnovers.

K-State did put together a 8-2 run late in the half and cut a double-digit lead to six at halftime.

K-State coach Deb Patterson said Kansas was playing poised basketball.

"I felt like KU came out very confident, and in rhythm, and playing very intelligent," Patterson said.

Patterson said her team came out a little bit apprehensive early in the game.

"I felt as though our younger players came out with a tentative demeanor, and that strengthened KU's defense," Patterson said.

Entering the game, KU had held opponents to 37 percent from the field, and the Cats shot just 33 percent from the field against the Jayhawks. In the loss, the Wildcats committed 22 turnovers and were one for eight from the three-point arch.

The Jayhawks were able to build a first-half lead behind the play of Big 12 player of the week Pride and Reeves. At intermission, Pride and Reeves each had eight points.

Early in the game Patterson said she felt like her team had a chance to win.

"I didn't feel as though we were playing great basketball, but we were playing well enough to be in the ballgame," Patterson said.

"We just did not come out in the second 20 minutes and convert."

With 17:51 remaining in the second half, Kansas went on a 9-0 run early and never looked back.

The Jayhawks led on the run by Reeves to build on a 15-point lead and kept going. Reeves finished the game with a career-high 26 points.

Patterson said she was disappointed with her team's inability to make stops on the defensive end and allowing Kansas to pick apart the team's zone defense.

"They did a nice job of sneaking behind our zone," Patterson said.

Junior forward Nicky Ramage said the Cats allowed Kansas too many layups in the second half.

"Every time down the floor it seemed like they got a layup," Ramage said.

Sophomore forward Brandy Harris said the game is not really indicative of the type of basketball K-State is capable of playing.

"It really is difficult," Harris said.

"We know we can play better than that."

The Cats have a week off before playing Saturday at Colorado.

14-2 record after going 3-13 two years ago, the year before Reeves took over.

But even if Denver's offense hadn't self-destructed, the Falcons would have had problems because the defense just couldn't stop Elway. Denver scored on six of its first 10 possessions and was stopped twice because Jason Elam missed field goals.

Elway was intercepted on the other possession and the Broncos punted just once in the game. So did the Falcons, but they lost the ball four times on turnovers.

Bars in downtown Denver were havens of orange and blue as the Broncos took on the Atlanta Falcons. After Denver's 34-19 win, many brought their drinks and celebrations outdoors.

But police were prepared because, last year, about 30,000 people gathered downtown after the Broncos beat the Green Bay Packers in the Super Bowl. There were more than 25 arrests and 50 people were overcome by tear gas after people smashed shop windows, overturned cars and set fires in Larimer Square.

Denver police used tear gas Sunday night to disperse crowds downtown after Broncos fans spilled into the streets to celebrate.

In Lower Downtown, bars emptied as the game ended and fans started bonfires and set off firecrackers in Larimer Square.

When the crowds would not break up, police threw tear gas canisters and marched down Larimer Street in riot gear, pounding their shields with their

Elsewhere, officers on horseback kept crowds in check.

At several spots downtown, people waved special editions of the Denver Rocky Mountain News and The Denver Post, climbed poles and waved pennants.

As the game ended, police blocked access into downtown from Interstate 25, which runs through the city.

Colorado Gov. Bill Owens, in Miami for the game but on his way back for the celebratory parade Monday, also was dismayed by the mayhem.

"Colorado has so much to be proud of tonight... it would be a shame to mar it with any more violence," Owens said.

In several spots, officers on horseback kept crowds in check.

Officials have said they believe a relatively small number of people were responsible for problems that dog the city after championship games.

"Most law-abiding people found the people that were doing that pretty disgusting," said city spokesman Andrew Hudson.

"It's idiotic. It's that kind of behavior that is going to get people hurt and get people arrested," he said.

Police issued warnings to the crowd before they threw the tear gas Sunday night. But there was tension between the police and fans.

Jeff Sherwood, 29, said he and his friends were caught off guard by the police response.

"We came down right after the game," he said.

"I walked up next to a policeman. He said, 'Do you think you are safe?' Then they tear-gassed us," Sherwood said.

HALLEY'S COMET

TOMÁŠ KUBINEK

ORDER YOUR TICKETS TODAY!

Look back on some of the most memorable events of the century through the eyes of a man who has experienced everything from war to the invention of fast food, as he relates his experiences to his "old friend" the comet. Starring and written by John Amos, "Good Times," "Roots," "Coming to America," Halley's Comet promises an evening of exhilarating theatre.

K-State's own United Black voices will make a special appearance in connection with Halley's Comet.

"A funny and touching journey through 76 years of the American experience." — Patricia O'Haire, Daily News, New York.

Pre-performance talk by Dan Davy, Asst. Professor of Theatre, at 7:00 p.m. in McCain 204.

Halley's Comet
Starring John Amos

management, said he wouldn't mind the new plan, but he doesn't think freshman and sophomores will go for it.

"I wouldn't mind, but if I was a freshman I probably wouldn't be too fond of it," he said. "As much as I hate standing in lines, everybody comes and has a fair go at it."

Kelly Tauscher, freshman in industrial engineering, said it was a good plan.

"I think it's actually kind of a good idea. There is no other way really," she said. "Everyone should get a chance, but that's obviously not going to happen."

URICK

Plus it would make it easier."

But as a freshman, Tauscher said she's not crazy about the idea of seniority because that gives her less of a chance to buy tickets.

"I don't like it because I'm only going to be a sophomore, but I think that's probably the most fair way."

Tadeo Franco, freshman in electrical engineering, said the new way would be better than last year's system.

"I think that would be easier," he said. "I like it."

Franco also said going by seniority is fine with him, especially since there is the possibility of 1,000 more tickets.

"That gives us a thousand more chances," he said.

Macklin said the feedback they received from students they worked with and talked to, including many freshman, was quite positive.

He said the consensus of the first-year students he talked to was that students who have been here for four years and supported the football team for four years should get tickets before them.

Plans for ICAT have not been decided. Urick said he is waiting for more feedback from the ICAT student board.

Both Urick and Macklin said they think this plan will work and last a long time.

However, getting it going will be tough because not only is the Athletic Ticket Office involved but also the Registrar's Office, Controller's Office, Cashier Office, Information Systems Office and the Card Center.

"To accomplish this is going to be a challenge," Urick said. "But I think we can do it."

cards from each night are placed together, and at the end of Telefund a winner will be drawn.

Dowell said businesses are happy to donate to Telefund.

"The businesses understand how important Telefund is, and they are willing to support the students in what they are doing," he said.

Dowell said K-State's Telefund is unlike any other in the country.

"K-State is unique in that we recruit a crew of volunteer callers, whereas other universities have a paid crew," he said.

"The really significant thing about this program is that we have students contributing their time and supporting fellow students," Dowell said.

During the past 19 years, Telefund has generated more than $10.6 million. Last year, $1,009,614 was raised by the Telefund. The goal is to raise $1,100,000 this year, Dowell said.

Jan Wissman, associate dean of the College of Education, is in charge of coordinating the College of Education Telefund. Wissman said student contact with alumni is valuable.

"Students gain an appreciation for their program by talking to alumni," she said.

Colleges recruit student volunteers for the Telefund in different ways. Wissman said the College of Education works with Kappa Delta Pi, an education honorary.

Kappa Delta Pi selects two student Telefund co-chairs. The chairs recruit 20 coaches, who then recruit 10 student volunteers.

The College of Education has three assigned nights to call for Telefund, Wissman said.

Students are encouraged to call their parents or other family members for their first call.

All the money that is collected is put into a Parents' Scholarship Fund. The funds are divided and put into scholarships. Students win the scholarships through a random drawing.

Tara Bell, junior in psychology and biology, will be participating in her third Telefund this year. Bell said she likes the idea of the scholarship fund.

"It's a great way to reward students who volunteered their time for Telefund," she said.

The alumni are interested in helping K-State and students, Bell said. She encourages other students to participate in Telefund.

"Students have everything to gain from it," she said. "You don't have anything to lose."

of people don't know who Elaine Brown is, but after she wrote 'A Taste of Power,' she gained a lot of recognition. The rights to the book have been bought, and they're making a movie out of her story."

In addition to serious events like the speakers, there are several fun events planned as well, Clark said.

One of the more informal events is "Issues in Black," where people will talk about a variety of things in an entertaining talk-show setting. "Issues in Black," sponsored by Clark's fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha, will be from 6-8 p.m. Wednesday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Another event during Black History Month is "Singed Out," sponsored by Alpha Kappa Alpha sorority. It will be from 7 p.m. to midnight on Feb. 11 Union Station.

"We want to do many things that include students and are not too preachy or negative, and that are informative as well as entertaining," Robinson said.

The purpose of Black History Month is to promote awareness nationally and on campus concerning the history of blacks, and to provide activities for students to get more involved, Robinson said.

"I encourage everyone to get involved in this year's activities," Clark said. "Just because it is Black History Month, it is not a black month. The events are not just for African-American students, but for all students."

The theme for this year's Black History Month is "Remembering the Past . . . Foraging the Future: The Movement Continues."

The idea behind the theme is to look back at how far BSU has come and how far it still has to go, Robinson said. In addition to Black History Month activities on campus, BSU members will participate in national events taking place in February. The members will travel to the University of Colorado in Boulder for a Big 12 conference Feb. 18-21 on black student government.

The conference provides students with educational workshops, a career and job fair, and parties where they will be able to mingle with students from other schools.

Robinson said the conference gives students an opportunity to exchange ideas and come up with new ways to make a difference on their campuses.

Duane Muck said. He said Wick had been a pole vaulter until this semester. This semester, he said Wick decided to take a break from track to focus more on his school work.

"Nathan lived there, but Jody was his real roommate," Duane Muck said. "Jody was his best friend, and always will be his best friend. He'll always be just like a son to us, too."

Muck came to K-State after spending a year playing baseball at Dodge City Community College, Duane Muck said. Once he arrived at K-State, though, Muck gave up baseball to focus on schoolwork.

"He loved sports, but there's always a day we've got to hang those shoes up," Duane Muck said. "He knew he wanted to make a living to support him and Stephanie."

"I told him to do what you love, because you only get one chance. He knew that his future wasn't in baseball."

Muck's mother, Linda Muck, said Muck was planning to marry his fiancée, Stephanie Roach, sophomore in apparel, marketing and design, in July 2000. She said that if the two high school sweethearts were to wed, Wick probably would have been in the ceremony.

"If there had been a wedding, I think Christian would have wanted Jody to be his best man," Linda Muck said. "He really loved Jody."

Muck began rooming with Wick when he transferred to K-State from Dodge City. Duane Muck said that at both Dodge City and at K-State, Muck always had given everything all he had.

"When he studied, he studied hard," Duane Muck said. "When he practiced, he practiced hard. When he partied, he partied hard."

"He probably lived more life in 21 years than I'll probably live in my whole life."

Jager said there was significant damage to the car, which is registered to David Leeper.

The damage was more severe at the right front of the vehicle but was substantial along the entire right side. Jager said it appears that Muck was ejected from the passenger side door.

The police report lists six witnesses who apparently heard the crash from inside their homes and came out to assist the victims.

Police said it appears alcohol and rate of speed might have contributed to the accident. A blood alcohol content test was performed on Wick, and police are still waiting for the results, which could take up to one month.

Lt. Doug Howser, who was on the scene after the accident, said the case is still under investigation.

"The case will be reviewed by the county attorney in the near future, and that is when any additional charges will be filed," he said. "There will not be a DUI issued until after we get the blood alcohol results."

Services will be at 10 a.m. today at the Osborne Christian Church in Osborne, Kansas.

Chunxiao Shi, third grade instructor, writes on the board while explaining a photograph taken in China as a way of teaching her students both the language and the history of China. The class is almost totally spoken in Chinese so the children hear, read, sing and write the language as part of their learning. Classes last for one hour on Wednesday and two hours every Saturday in East Stadium.

Chinese, Taiwanese children learn language and culture at school in East Stadium

Some parents find the curriculum offered at local schools leave their child's education incomplete.

Parents of Chinese and Taiwanese descent might choose to send their children to special schools to complement their regular schooling. Classes in the language and culture of countries such as Taiwan and China often are taught by parents or by K-State students.

The Chinese school meets on Wednesdays for one hour and on Saturdays for two hours in the East Stadium. The schools have four teachers for first through fourth grades. Thirty-two children are enrolled.

Zongzhu Lin, associate professor of math, has a 9-year-old son in the Chinese school. Lin said he took his son to China last year, but by Christmas, the boy had forgotten how to speak Chinese.

"By knowing different languages, the children can use different ways to express themselves," Lin said.

Lin said finding volunteers to teach groups was no problem.

"It's much easier for parents to teach a group of kids and not just their own child," Lin said.

There were certain requirements, though. The teachers had to be patient and had to interact well with the children.

Ning Gao, who was a teacher in China, teaches third grade at the Chinese school. Gao said she concentrates mainly on reading in the classroom because most of the children speak Chinese at home but don't know how to write in Chinese.

Although the school is sponsored by the Chinese Student and Scholar Association, it is not a member of the Association of Chinese Schools and therefore does not receive much funding.

Plans for the future include reducing costs. American children were turned down because of lack of resources. If cost wasn't a factor, the school would be able to cater to people of all ages and cultures.

Parents and teachers are reimbursed for their time, and books and photocopies also add to costs.

Chunxiao Shi, a third-grade teacher, said the education is worth it.

"China and America work together in a lot of businesses," Shi said. "It's important to know both languages and cultures."

For some, the reason for attending class is much simpler.

"My mom signed me up, and I'm Chinese," said Felix Wang, third-grader at the school.

By Lin's estimates, Wang has only three more years until the language will be engraved in his memory. Lin said that after sixth grade, the students should be able to retain the language.

"But it's not simply about a language," Lin said. "It's about having an open mind and accepting different things."

One of these differences is the Taiwanese culture. Although Chinese is the official language of Taiwan, the Taiwanese school educates the children in Taiwanese culture.

The school has 12 children who are divided into two classes. One of the classes is taught by Vivian Wu, graduate student in food sciences and industry.

She taught primary school students in Taiwan before coming to K-State.

Wu said she believed teaching was hard at times.

"Their parents want them to speak Chinese, but they don't like to much when they play," Wu said.

The older children in the other class, however, have learned to appreciate the importance of learning another language.

"When we grow up, we can write to other people," 6-year-old Michelle Change said. "If someone doesn't know English, we can talk to them."

This is what their parents expect from the school. Sue Huang, who has two children at the school, said she thought it would benefit her children to interact with kids from the same country and to be able to talk to her relatives.

"It's always good to speak a second language," Huang said. "They can communicate with their grandparents. They can do business."

Jane Hsu, whose two children also attend the school, said she agrees.

"We want them to learn their roots," Hsu said. "If they visit their grandparents and cousins, they won't feel as outsiders."

The Taiwanese school meets every Friday for 1 1/2 hours. Its plans includes cutting costs, even though it receives some financial support and teaching material from the Taipei Cultural and Economic Center in Kansas City, Kan.

Chun-Yen Chang, a parent and teacher at the school, said it is necessary for children to learn at an early age.

"Usually, they'll lose their capability of speaking Chinese when they're older," Chang said. "We're trying to keep up with their ability and learning the culture, which involves respecting their parents and elders."

Yang Jiang, 9-year-old Manhattan resident, raises her hand to answer a question in Chunxiao Shi's class Saturday afternoon in East Stadium. Jiang said she thinks the class is really useful, especially after a trip last summer to China. Without the class, she said she wouldn't have been able to communicate with her grandparents.

UPC event allows students to make the most of wax

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Visitors to the K-State Student Union today can walk away from a Union Program Council event with something tangible.

UPC Special Events is sponsoring an activity in the Union Courtyard today from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., in which students can make candles and even a wax mold of their hands. The event is free, and there are no limits to the number of items that participants can create.

Heide McBride, UPC adviser, said the committee first learned of the event in November when the UPC committee chairmen attended a conference for the National Association for Campus Activities. The project of making candles and wax hands was presented at the conference and was a large success, McBride said.

"There was a huge line at the exhibit, and everyone was very excited about it," McBride said. "It was a very popular activity at the conference, and we thought it would be equally popular with the students."

The candles are made using scoops of small wax beads that are put into a small glass globe. The beads then can be moved around to create any number of shapes or designs.

After the design is finished, a blowtorch is used to melt a hole in the candle so the wick can be inserted. Since the candle will burn only an inch in diameter, the outer design of the candle remains even after the candle is burnt. Only the wax in the middle burns, McBride said.

The wax hands, also a popular activity at the annual Renaissance Festival in Bonner Springs, Kan., involves the participants dipping their hands in a vat of white wax until the wax hardens. The hands are dipped in cold water so the participant easily can retract their hands from the replica. Then, the new wax mold can be dipped in a variety of more than 10 colors of wax.

McBride said the activity is taking place between the hours of 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. because of the large traffic flow through the Union during that time, and because it will provide an entertaining activity for students.

"It will give them something to do in between classes," McBride said.

Melanie Tull, senior in mass communications and UPC Special Events committee chairwoman, said she agreed, and the event was targeted toward those who are in the Union during the lunch hour and early afternoon.

"We're counting on those people to be here," Tull said. "We want as many people to take advantage of this as possible."

Tull said the fact that the event is free will be a large factor in drawing crowds.

"This will let people know there are things happening on campus that are free," she said.

Lewinsky prepares to testify as support for perjury charge wanes

BY LAURIE KELLMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Republican senators on Sunday said some of their colleagues might vote against removing President Clinton from office. House prosecutors, meanwhile, prepared to question Monica Lewinsky in a last-ditch effort to strengthen their case.

As Lewinsky waited at the Mayflower Hotel for her deposition today, cracks appeared in the unified Republican front on the perjury and obstruction charges against Clinton.

"The sense right now in just listening to members talk is that there are Republicans who either are not going to vote for perjury or the obstruction of justice charge," Sen. Tim Hutchinson, R-Ark., said in a telephone interview.

Hutchinson declined to estimate how many might vote to acquit, but he indicated that getting even 50 votes for conviction in a chamber controlled by 55 Republican senators is in doubt.

"You would (be) much closer to getting a majority in the obstruction (charge) than on the perjury charge" as the case now stands, he said.

House prosecutors have shifted their focus to the obstruction charge on the assumption that even among Republicans, there is questionable support for the notion that the untruths were serious enough to warrant the president's removal, according to an official who demanded anonymity.

Sources close to the committee have said that Rep. Ed Bryant of Tennessee, who will question Lewinsky, wants to elicit information on Clinton's efforts to conceal their affair from Paula Jones' lawyers and Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's grand jury.

Even as senators said they believe they don't have the 67 votes needed to remove him from office, Clinton's battles remained far from over.

Starr is considering seeking the president's indictment before Clinton's term expires. A legal source, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Sunday that Starr's view "for some time" has been that a sitting president is indictable.

"There is just no end to what this man is willing to do to continue to pursue the president," Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said.

"I think it's unfortunate because it gets in the way of our focus on what our constitutional obligation is," said Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, on ABC's "This Week."

Senators on the Sunday talk shows showed other signs of cracks in the GOP's unity that muscled through Republican plans last week to continue the trial and call witnesses.

Asked on NBC's "Meet the Press" how many Republicans would vote to convict Clinton on the perjury charge, Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., said, "Not as many as a lot of people believe."

"A number of senators who believe that the president lied under oath but that his wrongdoing in that area does not constitute perjury because of the legal definition of perjury," Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said.

One prospective presidential candidate issued a warning to Republicans up for re-election next year who vote against the articles of impeachment.

"Senators who vote to acquit just naturally will end up facing primary challengers," conservative activist Gary Bauer said on NBC.

Even with conviction apparently beyond reach, senators continued to search for ways to stop Clinton from walking away unpunished.

A Republican proposal to pass a "finding of fact" that would state that Clinton lied under oath and impeded justice crossed party lines.

Senate Budget Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M., pushed for the plan as a way to "make the record clear for history and posterity that we have indeed not let this go unintended."

U.S. planes fire on Iraq

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey — U.S. warplanes enforcing no-fly zones in southern and northern Iraq fired on Iraqi defense installations for the second straight day Sunday, U.S. officials said.

In southern Iraq, six U.S. and two British planes fired on two military sites in response to "Iraqi provocations," according to a statement released by the United States Central Command in MacDill, Fla.

"The targets were a communications repeater station at Talil and a radio relay facility at Al Amarah," said Maj. Joe LaMarca, a Central Command spokesman. He said they were targeted because of their role in aircraft command and control.

Al Amarah and Talil lie in an area about 150 miles southeast of Baghdad. There was no damage to the allied planes. Damage to the Iraqi sites was being assessed.

In the north, an Air Force F-16CJ Fighting Falcon launched a high-speed antiradiation missile, called HARM, at a radar system north of the city of Mosul, according to a statement from the Incirlik air base in southern Turkey, where the plane took off.

The statement from Operation Northern Watch said the Iraqi radar system posed a threat to the F-16 and coalition forces conducting routine enforcement of the no-fly zone above the 36th parallel. It said the U.S. plane fired in self defense.

On Saturday, U.S. jet fighters fired missiles on Iraqi defense sites in six incidents around Mosul. It was believed to be the single largest number of confrontations in a single day since Iraq began to challenge the jets in the no-fly zone last month.

Sunday, the Iraqi News Agency said Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf sent a letter to the Security Council complaining of U.S. missiles that struck the southern city of Basra on Jan. 25.

Iraq said at least 11 people were killed and 59 wounded in missile strikes in and around Basra, 230 miles south of the capital Baghdad. U.S. officials acknowledge that one missile went astray.

"American and British aircraft, based in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait ... targeted many sites, including residential districts in Basra itself and surrounding villages, causing the death and injury of many people," the letter said, INA reported.

Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit repeated his concern about the escalating tension.

"The pressure, needed to be imposed on the Iraqi administration to solve the problem, should be political rather than military," he said.

Two small leftist parties claimed in a demonstration in Istanbul on Sunday that the United States was trying to drag Turkey into the conflict.

In Baghdad, Iraq criticized the U.N. Security Council's recent decision to create study panels to assess Iraqi disarmament, humanitarian needs and the fate of missing Kuwaitis, saying Sunday that the move was nothing more than procrastination.

The Security Council agreed to form the study panels on Saturday in its first, modest step to break the diplomatic logjam over Iraq.

"The work of the three panels on Iraq will take several months, which means nothing but procrastination and maintaining the unjust blockade on Iraq," the INA quoted a government spokesman as saying, after a meeting between President Saddam Hussein and senior government and Baath party officials.

Recreational Services' Offices Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Circuit Training Area

Not just for body builders anymore, weightlifting is an excellent way to improve muscular strength and endurance and cardiovascular efficiency.

The circuit training area, located on the upper level at the Peters Recreation Complex, is set up for three separate programs: beginner, intermediate and advanced. Each program includes ten more stations which when combined together work all of the major muscle groups of both lower and upper body. This is a great way to begin a strength training program because of the safety of the machines used and the fact that a spotter is not needed.

Due to the difference in people, one weight training program is not ideal for everyone. Thus, programs for beginner, intermediate and advanced levels are color coded and posted in the circuit training area. These workouts include exercises like the chest press, shoulder press, leg extension, lateral pull-downs, biceps curl, and triceps extension, to name a few. These machines are also numbered for better identification.

There are a few things you should keep in mind before and during lifting. First of all, take ten minutes before lifting to warm up and stretch. Walking one or two laps on the track or biking for five minutes is a good way to get the blood circulating to the muscles you will be working. Then, use the stretching mats. Stretching helps reduce injury and muscle soreness. It would be beneficial to stretch before and after your workout. And once you begin your workout, remember to breathe properly. Do NOT hold your breath. Each exercise should be performed with slow, controlled movements, and you should also allow about 60-90 seconds of rest between sets. When you can perform the desired number of sets and repetitions easily, it is time to increase the amount of weight lifted.

If you have any questions, please feel free to stop in the Wellness Resource Center and ask one of the fitness consultants for help.

Nathan Lange, native of Beloit, KS, is an expert handling canoes and has been a familiar sight at Recreational Services' Outdoor Rental Center for the past four years. As manager, Lange is responsible for a variety of duties which includes helping customers rent camping equipment & canoes, cleaning gear & equipment, and maintaining the play fields. He enjoys the variety of activities and working independently both indoors & outdoors. Lange said the experience he has gained working for Recreational Services has improved his people skills, taught him to "get the job done," and has required that he be self-motivated. Nathan Lange is a senior in agecon with a minor in animal science.

Imagine exercising every day and getting paid to do it! Erika Thiessen, exercise leader, has lead exercise sessions here at the Rec Complex since the beginning of fall semester 1997. During this time, she has led aerobics, kick boxing, and cardio plus sessions. Thiessen said she always has fun with every session she leads and finds the variety of individuals who participate here interesting because of their wide range of backgrounds and exercise experience. Thiessen plans to graduate in December with a graphic design degree and hopes to begin a career in advertising in the Kansas City area.

Fitness Facts

If you are an active individual, you can probably tell anyone that accidents happen. For many injuries, black eyes to sprained ankles, ice is the answer to easing the pain and promoting the healing. While most athletic people will have anything from therapeutic gel packs to bags of frozen peas on hand, many people are still confused as to whether to use hot or cold for an injury.

The rule of thumb, in general, is to ice for the first 48 to 72 hours and use heat thereafter. Also remember that ice is best applied in the first 10-15 minutes of injury to decrease pain, swelling and bleeding. When applying ice, it is best to have a towel or even a T-shirt lying between the ice and the injured body part. When first applying the ice, be prepared for an aching or burning sensation. After about 5-10 minutes, the numbness takes over. It is best to leave the ice on between 10-30 minutes and then take a break for about 45 minutes. After that the ice can be reapplied for another 10-30 minutes. Switch to heat only when swelling and redness no longer exist, usually around the 72 hour mark.

Caution: Ice therapy "should not be used by anyone with rheumatoid arthritis, cold allergy, peripheral vascular disease or conditions such as Raynaud's phenomenon, vascular problems or decreased sensation," writes Louisiana physician Kim Edward LeBlanc.

Nutrition Notes

Okay, it has been a month now since you made those New Year's resolutions. Some of you may still be abiding by them, but many have probably already fallen off the track. That may not be such a bad thing, though. Chances are, if you aren't sticking with the program, it was unrealistic in the first place. So, let's try again.

The key to keeping the weight off is making the change a gradual one. You need to make steps in the right direction that will become habit. Focus on eating healthy and not "dieting". With this, you change from a short-term plan and go to a life-long plan. When choosing goods to eat, focus more on the bottom of the food pyramid and less from the top. Balance high and low-calorie foods so that you can enjoy some favorites and still eat healthier.

Remember, it is never too late to start a new resolution!

Joe Knopp, attorney for Wal-Mart and landowners Jim and Jane Johns, discusses the plans for a new Wal-Mart store on Seth Childs Road Monday night at a meeting of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board. The board postponed its decision on Wal-Mart's proposal in order to accommodate more public comment.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents concerned about the proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter spoke to the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board Monday night and entered into a five-hour dialogue on the topic, which ended with the board deciding to table the discussion until March 1.

The proposed store would be located at the intersection of Southwind Place and Seth Childs Road and would take up 151,000 square feet and operate 24 hours a day. The proposal has fanned flames of public opinion on business expansion, environmental effects and the survival of locally owned stores since this fall.

Those concerns brought a crowd that filled the available seats in the meeting room, an additional 17 to 18 folding chairs and more chairs in the outer room. Many in the audience wore bright orange "Wal-Mart Supercenter Never Next to Warner Park" stickers given out at the door, courtesy of David Macfarland, associate professor in journalism and mass communications.

"Let's set some ground rules," Board Chair Jerry Reynard said at the onset of the meeting.

Anticipating high public attendance for the meeting, the board had established a format allowing a total of 40 minutes for speakers representing Wal-Mart and the Arbor Heights-Warner Park Neighborhood Association respectively, 15 minutes for the city's report and three to five minutes per individual.

Attorney Joe Knopp, representing landowners Jim and Jane Johns and Wal-Mart, began his presentation on the topic of promises. Promises made, he said, when the city acquired state funds to widen Seth Childs Road on the premise that it would develop business in the Johns' tract, and promises broken when the city held off development in the area in a futile effort to restore the downtown area.

"At some point, we have to say enough is enough," Knopp said.

He continued by outlining how Wal-Mart's design for the supercenter will make it almost impossible to see from nearby neighborhoods and many roads. In addition, he said, many of the trees will be left in the area and some of the site will be permanently donated to Warner Park strictly for conservation.

Assistant Director of Planning Eric Cattell said city planners made minor adjustments to parts of the plan, particularly in efforts to contain noise and lighting within the store site.

After the introduction of their attorney Price Banks, members of the Arbor Drive-Warner Park Neighborhood Association then discussed why the proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter did not meet the 13 board considerations for zoning.

Amy Fischer-Moranz was one of several who said the store lighting will ruin the view of the sky residents enjoy now.

"Our night skies will be lit 24 hours a day. I do not believe any one of you would want to live as close to a Wal-Mart Supercenter, particularly the loading dock, as I soon will be forced to," she said.

Traffic increases, specifically on Seth Childs and Shuss Roads, were also discussed by both sides. Neighborhood Association member Mike Walter said previous studies suggesting a 2-percent traffic increase were invalid since they were performed during K-State's winter break.

"This is not done to point a finger, but to point out the study should be done on a more typical day," he said.

Clinton, Congress argue over surplus

By ALAN FRAM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Ushering in the year 2000 with the promise of huge federal surpluses, President Clinton proposed on Monday a $1.77 trillion budget for the year 2000 that would buttress Social Security and bestow billions on everything from troops to teachers.

Republicans who control Congress immediately vowed to rework much of it. Staking out this year's political battlefield, they insisted that hundreds of billions of the $2.41 trillion in surpluses Clinton envisions over the next decade should be returned to Americans in tax-rate cuts, not used for new spending.

"Basic fairness dictates that some of this overpayment should go back to the taxpayers," House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois said.

"We don't want to invent programs to spend the surplus on," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M.

Economists caution that a deep, protracted recession could erase the projected black ink, which began abruptly last year with a surplus of $69 billion.

But Clinton said that after three decades of unremitting deficits, the mountains of money give Washington a special obligation to address problems gnawing at the country. He would not only brace the government for the looming retirement of 76 million baby boomers but reduce the $5.6 trillion national debt built over decades of federal borrowing and spend money for scores of other purposes.

"We have a rare opportunity that comes along once in a blue moon to any group of Americans," Clinton said as he outlined his plan at the White House.

The partisan positioning underlined how even in a time of budget plenty, the two parties largely are continuing familiar appeals to their political bases. Democrats are rallying behind Social Security and expanded domestic spending, while Republicans are raising their twin banners of tax cuts and smaller government.

Clinton would spend $39 billion more, or 2 percent more, than is planned for fiscal year 1999, which runs through Sept. 30. Thanks to the humming economy, he said he anticipates $77 billion more in federal revenue, allowing this year's expected $79 billion surplus to swell to $117 billion in 2000.

The impeachment fallout could leave both sides eager to build records of legislative achievement, or it could make them eager to draw political distinctions as the 2000 elections approach. Initial signs pointed to confrontation.

Republicans agreed with Clinton that most of the surpluses should be set aside to trim the national debt and strengthen Social Security,

Lewinsky reaffirms earlier testimony

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In their first face-to-face meeting, White House lawyers offered Monica Lewinsky an apology Monday "on behalf of the president" for the difficulties the impeachment investigation has caused her. They turned down the chance to ask any questions during sworn testimony forced by House prosecutors.

The deposition of the former White House intern took place behind closed doors in the Mayflower Hotel's presidential suite but was videotaped for senators weighing the impeachment charges.

Rep. Ed Bryant, R-Tenn., spent about four hours posing questions on behalf of the House prosecution team that fought to persuade the Senate to summon Lewinsky. Her testimony closely tracked her earlier account to a federal grand jury, according to sources familiar with the testimony who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The sources were not associated with the House prosecution team and worked outside the White House. Lewinsky's lawyers declined comment.

By not questioning Lewinsky, the Clinton lawyers passed up an opportunity to challenge her statements.

One source said Lewinsky reaffirmed that:

■ When she asked Clinton what to do about subpoenaed gifts from him on Dec. 28, 1997, his response was something like "let me think about it."

Bramlage crowd, TV audience watch Cats fall to Jayhawks

STORY BY KELLY EVENSON

The Kansas Jayhawks extended their winning streak to 11 games in Bramlage Coliseum Monday night, beating the K-State men's basketball team by 23 points in front of a packed crowd and a national TV audience.

The crowd in Bramlage was energized as the two teams faced each other on the basketball court for the first time this season.

The Wildcats have not beaten their intrastate rivals at home since the team moved to Bramlage from Ahearn Field House.

Bramlage staff estimated attendance at around 13,000 fans. Before the game, some Wildcat faithful said the large crowd would make their chances better against the 22nd-ranked Jayhawks.

"They have beaten us every year, and it is our turn to beat them," Jeff White, sophomore in graphic design, said before the game.

Purple pom-poms and signs littered the student section as the basketball team played to a nearly sold-out crowd. The crowd was almost deafening at times, giving support to players on the court and playing to cameras from ESPN, which televised the game as part of its "Big Monday" lineup.

Carrie Yenne, senior in kinesiology, said the game favors were a big help in adding to the crowd involvement during the game.

"They do it for a lot of football games, so they should do it for basketball games, too," Yenne said. "When the crowd gets into it, it will be a good game."

The K-State/KU game is also known to bring closet KU fans out into the open. Though they cheered for the opposing team, some gave K-State a shot of winning.

"K-State has a good chance," Brent Dwerlkotte, senior in finance, said. "It just depends on which K-State team shows up, Dr. Jekyll or Mr. Hyde."

Weston Opat, K-State graduate, said a loss to 22nd-ranked KU would hurt the Cats.

"A win at home would be very important to the basketball program," Opat said. "A loss to KU is never good. It will hurt our chances in the NCAA and Big 12 tournaments."

Peace Corps offers chance to travel to other countries

Traveling to other countries is a dream many college students have. The Peace Corps is offering that opportunity to K-State students.

Lisa Wandke, Peace Corps recruiter from the Denver branch, will be at K-State today and Wednesday at an information table on the first floor of the K-State Student Union informing students about the Peace Corps.

Since its inception in 1961, more than 150,000 Americans have volunteered in the Peace Corps.

Wandke said her visit will be a good opportunity for students interested in the Peace Corps to ask questions and gather information about the program.

"It gives students a chance to find out more about Peace Corps and how they can make a difference," she said.

K-State is an important university in Kansas to recruit Peace Corps volunteers, Wandke said.

"K-State has excellent agricultural programs," Wandke said. "That is definitely something we look for in volunteers."

Julie Sinclair, K-State Peace Corps representative, served as a Peace Corps volunteer in the west African nation of Togo from 1989 to 1991.

Sinclair said the Peace Corps helped her grow as a person.

"I learned a lot about myself and how to cooperate and function in a variety of settings," she said.

Sinclair said she encourages others to volunteer in the Peace Corps.

"Peace Corps is a different experience for each individual, but definitely represents an opportunity to meet a challenge," she said.

Bill proposals could take young Kansans' licenses

TOPEKA — Legislators turned their attention to young Kansans on Monday as several bills on juvenile crime were introduced in the House.

One House bill would suspend students' driver's licenses for a year if they are expelled or suspended from school for possessing a weapon or drugs or behaving in a way likely to injure others. Another House bill would add hunting rifles, bludgeons, metal knuckles, throwing stars and switchblades to the weapons prohibited by the Weapon-Free Schools Act.

Gov. Bill Graves' legal team crafted the bills, which are a result of Graves' campaign pledge to make schools safer.

"The governor's thoughts are to hit young people where they live," Mike Matson, Graves' spokesman, said. "For most people, that first driver's license is one of the highlights of their lives."

Matson and House Education Committee Chairman Ralph Tanner said they had not heard any opposition to the bills from gun lobbyists.

"I'm probably going to be surprised if the NRA would get involved in that," Tanner said. "A school kid is somewhat different from an adult when it comes to that."

Although Tanner supports both bills, he said there may be a legal challenge to the driver's license bill because driving is not related to drugs or weapons.

"It may not be seen as having a nexus or connection to the offense," he said.

Kansas taxpayers can file returns on home computers

TOPEKA — Most Kansas taxpayers will be able file their individual state returns this year with their home computers thanks to a new program from the Department of Revenue.

"Ever since we put Kansas tax forms on our home page in 1996, we've had users tell us they want a way to file online," Revenue Secretary Karla Pierce said. "Kansas PC File gives them that."

Pierce said taxpayers can go to the department's home page, click on the "File Free" prompt and then download all forms necessary to file either a short form or itemized deductions.

Pierce said a taxpayer had to file a paper return last year and have a computer with Windows 95 or better to be eligible for the online service.

She said the new computer program cost the state $130,000, adding, "It's a good investment for a good service."

Nude show stuns officials at University of Iowa

IOWA CITY, Iowa — The University of Iowa doesn't welcome a full monty.

School officials are trying to decide what to do about a male strip show that involved full frontal nudity in front of several hundred women in the student union.

"We do have policies regarding nudity and material that is explicit," said Ann Rhodes, vice president of university relations.

Other campus performances have involved nudity, but Rhodes said those have been artistic performances "where we try and make sure that the work as a whole is being evaluated, that nudity is not the focus of the event."

The event Saturday at the Iowa Memorial Union was billed "Ladies Nite: African-American All-Male Revue Dance Show," and was sponsored by the Black Entrepreneurial Association. It featured five dancers from Chicago.

"They came out in clothes and went down to G-strings," freshman Felicia Penza said.

Then, she said, they went further. Organizer Derick Mitchell said he had tried to keep the dancers from going too far, "but once they did it, what can you do?"

Rhodes said she'd never heard of the Black Entrepreneurial Association and didn't know whether it was recognized by the university, but said it and any student members might face sanctions.

Weakened AIDS virus might actually cause the disease

NEW YORK — A study in monkeys suggests using a weakened AIDS virus as a vaccine might actually cause the disease.

Some scientists have proposed using weakened HIV as a vaccine, and some animal studies have been encouraging. But in the new work, researchers found AIDS in some macaques that had been inoculated with a genetically crippled version of a virus called SIV, a cousin of HIV.

The Associated Press reported the conclusions of the work last July when results were presented at an AIDS meeting. The details now are presented in the February issue of the journal Nature Medicine by Dr. Ruth Reprecht of the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute and collaborators.

One of 16 macaques vaccinated as adults developed AIDS, as did six of eight animals vaccinated as infants researchers reported. Some other animals developed immune-system abnormalities.

Census 2000 begins with address lists

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The countdown continues, even though officials still have to solve a lot of technical problems.

Census 2000 will start to count all U.S. citizens next year. The first step is to check and prepare address lists this year.

The census is conducted every 10 years and takes on two important functions. The results determine the reapportionment for the House of Representatives and how federal funds will be distributed.

The census could give students the opportunity to make some extra money. The Kansas Census Bureau Recruiting Office will look for 10 to 15 workers for the Riley County area. 400,000 workers could be needed nationwide. The address lister job will last up to eight weeks.

"We will start the address operation in March," said Dennis Johnson, assistant regional manager for the census, Kansas City, Mo. "Applicants do not need any specific experience."

The company will pay more than $7 per hour and accept part- or full-time hours. The workers will have to check neighborhoods for houses that might not be readily visible to assure they receive their census questionnaire.

"We implement the process nationwide in the same manner," said Kim Greenwood, team leader for census, Kansas City, Mo.

Last week the Supreme Court decided the Census 2000 has to use the conventional door-to-door head count of the U.S. population for the reapportionment of congressional seats. It rejected the proposal to carry out scientific sampling to correct for undercounts.

The court's 5-4 decision might cause some inconvenience at census headquarters, as officials had favored the sampling method.

The sampling technique is widely used for polls and surveys, which allows statisticians to adjust data for the whole population based on a certain number of experiments. Democrats

Union Program Council brought Wax and More to the K-State Student Union Monday. Students stood in line to make candles and wax molds of their hands. The first step was dipping their hands in ice-cold water, then into the warm wax eight times. After the molds were made, ice water helped to remove students' hands from inside the molds.

Students wax artistic with UPC

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some students walked away from the K-State Student Union with an extra hand or two Monday.

The Union Program Council Special Events Committee sponsored Wax and More of Dallas to give students an opportunity to create a mold of their hands. Those who did not wish to dip their hands in wax had the chance to make a candle.

The process involved first cooling the hands down by dipping them into containers of ice water, followed by six to eight dips into a large vat of melted paraffin. Students then stuck their wax-covered hands back into the ice water to make the mold hard and brittle.

Albert Rangel of Wax and More said the second dunk into the ice water is to harden the wax and break it free from the skin.

"The 'I love you' sign or wrestling are the most popular molds," Rangel said.

Glenn King, sophomore in open option, made several creations, including a mold of his face.

"I've never seen this before, and it was a new experience," King said.

He said he expected the wax to be hot, but it was actually lukewarm.

"It just felt funny," King said. "I kept sticking my hand in it, and each time, it got warmer, and my hand finally got stiff."

Jennifer Binder, freshman in bakery science and management, heard about the molds from a friend. She said she decided to place her hands together and make one mold from both of them together.

"It was hard for me to not want to wipe off the dripping wax myself," Binder said. "I'm glad I did it. I really wasn't going to at first, but since it was free, I decided I would."

Jessica Tovar, sophomore in kinesiology, and Brian Peterson, sophomore in construction science and management, have been engaged since November and decided to make a mold while holding hands together.

"I drug him along because I didn't want to do it alone," Tovar said.

Peterson said he also enjoyed the activity but thought the mold would break.

"It was kind of cool. The hardest part about it was keeping our hands together," Peterson said. "If you've got hair on your arms, it hurts when they take it off."

Most students said they planned to use the models of their hands as decorative ornaments for their apartments and dorm rooms.

"I'm just going to set it on my TV," King said. "It will probably break because I'll keep playing with it so much."

Student input helps solve ticket situation

Football ticket sales will be easier for students this fall if an initiative by Student Body President Tracey Mann and Vice President Andy Macklin goes into action.

While it seemed student senators were sitting on their hands, Mann, Macklin and their committee figured out a plan to solve the biggest issue of last semester.

The plan, which makes buying tickets like enrolling in class, will solve the problem of the long lines of previous semesters.

Each student will be allowed to buy only one ticket, ending the controversy of one student being able to buy up to four other student tickets. Now no student will be cheated out of a ticket.

However, more work is needed to incorporate ICAT sales into the new ticket program. This item is the only issue left unresolved. ICAT needs to be integrated into the program, perhaps as another class option.

This new ticket program is the fairest option presented so far, allowing students with the most hours — seniors and juniors — to get the first opportunity to buy tickets. Last semester, only half of the junior class was able to get season tickets.

It will also eliminate the expensive necessity of having to buy the football and basketball ticket package to ensure obtaining football tickets.

Sophomores and freshmen might be the group who loses with the new plan because all the class ticket options might be filled when they go to enroll, but a seniority system is the best option.

The new system also will remove the first of the year hassle of skipping classes to wait in line for tickets.

Athletic Director Max Urick should be commended for listening to student input and for adding 1,000 student seats.

Students were given ample time to voice their ideas for solving the ticket sales problem. This plan is easily the most logical and feasible solution to come from the debates.

NUCLEAR THREAT STILL A REALITY

Something happened in Washington, D.C., last week that really should have had Americans everywhere worried. For once, this doesn't involve anybody named Monica. I am referring to the fact that the Clinton administration asked Congress for $6.6 billion over the next five years to build a national defense against a long-range nuclear missile attack. Secretary of Defense William Cohen admitted that the threat of a long-range nuclear attack exists and is growing. The threat comes from the small-scale nuclear countries, like North Korea, Iran or Iraq, that we really don't have an accurate guess of what kind of capabilities they actually have.

Now wait a minute. Weren't we promised back in 1994 that we didn't need any such thing? That was the end of the break-up of the former Soviet Union and the end of the Cold War. The shadow that had been constantly hanging over our heads of nuclear war, the end of the world as we know it, was gone. The so-called "Star Wars" program that Reagan had initiated in 1983 was killed. As "Monty Python" fans would say, "And there was much rejoicing. Yeah."

So what the heck happened in the five years since? It's obvious that we haven't been getting good information on the rate at which the smaller countries have been developing their nuclear arsenals or we have been vastly underestimating them.

Last year, U.S. intelligence said that a potential nuclear threat from one of these countries would not be a problem until the year 2010. The next week, North Korea launched a missile that we had said they wouldn't have for another 15 years. Whoops. That missile didn't have the capabilities to reach the United States, but the point was made. U.S. intelligence had to say, "My bad."

So we get some defenses in place real quick, and all is well, right? The snag that the Clinton administration is up against now is that we are still signed to the 27-year old Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty with the former Soviet Union. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright is in talks with Russia right now to amend the ABM Treaty so we can develop the defense system. Obviously, it isn't real excited about this. Neither is the other nuclear power, China.

Now I must admit, I am really confused about this news. I remember learning about Hiroshima and the horrors that were unleashed there. Throughout my school years, I remember doing book reports and projects on nuclear war and its threats. It's not that I found it fascinating. Learning about it was just my way of trying to understand that with a couple pushes of a button, our lives could be changed forever. Stuff like that is what keeps you up late at night wishing you still had your teddy bear.

So, along with the entire world, I remember breathing a sigh of relief when we were told that it was no longer a problem. But, now this. The horrors of nuclear war are right back here, yet it is like we don't even notice.

To me, nothing could be more important right now than the fact that there is a nuclear threat out there. There are nations with a less-than-favorable view of our country (or more aptly put — most of them just want to kill all of us American pigs) that could be developing technology to use on our country right now and we have no defense in place to stop such an attack. So what is dominating our headlines from Washington right now? I'll give you a hint, it starts with impeachment and ends with trial.

Don't get me wrong; I am in no way saying that what is going on now in Washington is not important. I am saying that we are ignoring something that I consider much more important. We need to understand that this is a real threat and if we ignore it, it won't go away. It will, no pun at all, blow up in our face.

Nuclear weapons always will be one of the scariest things that we as a human race have come up with. I can't really think of much else that outright puts fear in my heart like when I think of the effects of such a blast. Building a missile defense is not really what we need to be doing, either. We should be seeking a way to rid us of these weapons of destruction. That is not something that ever will be easy. In fact, it might never get done. That doesn't mean we can't try.

I am glad that we finally are recognizing the fact that there still is a problem. I just hope it is not too late. There is nothing scarier to me than the idea that a madman like Saddam Hussein could have his hands on a missile, with the capabilities to reach the United States, and us having no defenses in place. We were 15 years off on our last estimate, so who knows how much knowledge those nations actually do have. Yet as a nation, we are simply fascinated with who the next impeachment trial witness will be. America needs to get its priorities in line.

READERS write

U.S. Senate should keep doors open to ensure checks and balances

Editor,

Your editorial on the value of openness in a democratic government should be required reading for all who seek public office.

Yes, when the U.S. Senate goes into closed session during the impeachment trial, it legally can do so. The Senate has legislated openness for federal agencies but not for itself. And yes, it's unlikely that any Senate deliberation will stay secret — especially with 200 reporters in the hallways and senators heading for microphones at the end of each day.

That's not the point. The point is, our checks-and-balances system of government is messy and often publicly so. This public messiness, while often discomforting, gives us confidence that the democratic process is at work. You stated your case extremely well.

Capital punishment seeks revenge, doesn't teach a lesson

Karla Faye was born the daughter of a prostitute. She was addicted to heroine by age 10. She was a prostitute by age 13. Opportunities for her to become something other than a criminal were limited. In 1984, she was robbed by a man who rode into her living room on his motorcycle, broke some of her things and stole from her. The next day, under the influence of drugs and alcohol, she broke into the cyclist's apartment. But she didn't stop at stealing from him. She and an accomplice savagely murdered the motorcycle rider and a woman sleeping beside him. She drove a pickax into the bodies of her victims 57 times.

Almost a year ago, on Feb. 3, 1998, Karla Faye Tucker received the ultimate punishment. She was lethally injected, while death penalty proponents cheered outside.

The one-year anniversary of her controversial execution, as well as Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan's grant of clemency to a death row inmate and Pope John Paul II's visit to St. Louis have renewed the debate about capital punishment.

Tucker became the first woman since the Civil War to receive the death penalty in Texas. Her death marked the 437th state-sanctioned execution in the United States since 1976 when capital punishment was reintroduced through the courts.

Prior to her death, the pope asked Texas Gov. George W. Bush for leniency. Pat Robertson, a religious leader and general supporter of the death penalty, asked for clemency as well. Even the brother of one of Tucker's victims pleaded her case. She was a changed woman, they said. She embraced Christ as her personal redeemer and, while in prison, married a prison chaplain. She felt genuine remorse for her actions and was no longer a threat to society.

We all remember where we were the day the Challenger exploded. People of another generation can tell you where they were when they heard President Kennedy was shot.

People remember these events because they were attacks on our values and our lives. People identified with Christa McAuliffe and her dream to fly in space. Her tragic death was an affront to how we believe life should be. People should live for their dreams, not die for them.

President Kennedy's death was an insult to our government. As Americans, we believed, and still do, that change in government should be in the hands of legislators and people in the ballot box, not in the hands of people holding guns.

Tucker's death was disrespectful to my values, and I always will remember where I was when she was executed. Her death changed my view of our justice system and my opinion about capital punishment.

Capital punishment is perfect justice meted out by imperfect people. Putting people in chairs and pulling the switches that will electrocute them is an irreversible act. One book, "In Spite of Innocence: Erroneous Convictions in Capital Cases," by Michael L. Radelet, Hugo Adam Bedau and Constance E. Putnam cites 416 real-life stories of innocent men convicted of crimes that are punishable by death. In more than 20 of the cases, the innocent man was executed. That is unacceptable. Executing an innocent person is a risk we shouldn't be willing to take.

Imperfect people also allow their prejudices into the jury box. Blacks are sentenced to death at a disproportionate rate compared to whites. Men are sentenced to death at a disproportionate rate compared to women — even when the crimes are equally as heinous and deserving.

On the eve of Tucker's execution, Bush had to decide whether to grant Tucker a one-time, 30-day stay of execution. He chose not to. He said, "I have concluded judgments about the heart and soul of an individual on death row are best left to a higher authority."

However, judgment by a higher authority would have been Tucker's fate, as it will one day be all of ours, regardless of whether the executioners of Texas murdered her the next day or she died of natural causes in 50 years.

Murderers should be accountable for their actions. They certainly should be punished. However, Tucker's death did not serve as a punishment. It served only as vengeance on behalf of her victims who, I believe, forgave her long ago.

When we punish children, we seek to teach them a lesson — we don't seek revenge. We don't steal from them to teach them stealing is bad. We don't, at least we shouldn't, punch them to show that hitting is wrong. We take away their freedom by sitting them in time out or by grounding them.

The pope's stance on the death penalty proves he understands the difference between punishment and vengeance. One purpose of his recent visit was to explain to us that all life, especially human life, is sacred in the eyes of God. The pope also wanted us to realize that it isn't our place to exact vengeance. That responsibility is best left to God.

It is written in Romans 12:18, "Vengeance is mine, and I will repay, sayeth the Lord."

Law center might open earlier than expected

By BRIAN HERNANDEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The construction of Riley County's new law-enforcement center is well under way and is scheduled to open late this year or early 2000.

The $10.8 million project began this past October and has a contract completion date of Feb. 11, 2000. Riley County Police Department Director Alvan Johnson said he hopes to have it completed sooner than that date.

"With good weather it could happen late this year," Johnson said. "Another factor will be the prompt delivery of materials and other variables."

Riley County acquired the site located at the junction of Seth Childs Road and Kansas Highway 18 and broke ground last October. The site work was completed two weeks ago. The footings then were set, and the foundation was poured soon after.

Johnson said he has had three pre-construction meetings with the general contractor and the subcontractors. They assured him the project is on schedule and should be right at budget. In fact, he said there is the possibility the project could cost less than the $10.8 million budget, but many variables, such as the weather and delivery of materials, could change that.

The state-of-the-art facility will unify the patrol and records departments, the investigations department and the county jail. It will be the first time in the police department's 26-year history all six divisions will be unified under the same roof.

Johnson said that fact alone will enhance all of RCPD's day-to-day operations.

"We haven't had a home since we became an operation of statute in 1974," he said. "We have been operating out of make shift buildings ever since then. It will be the first permanent home we have ever had."

RCPD Capt. Dana Kyle said the department still plans to hire an additional 16 employees prior to the center's opening. Ten correctional officers, four correctional supervisors and two communication dispatchers will be hired and trained on a sliding system beginning in August.

The state-of-the-art facility will unify the patrol and records department, the investigations department and the county jail. It will be the first time in the police department's 26-year history all six divisions will be unified under the same roof.

"We need to add these employees since this will be a much larger facility that requires around-the-clock supervision," Kyle said. "This is the type of structure the citizens of Riley County decided they wanted us to have."

Johnson said he has a personal reason for wanting the center open in 1999.

"Since I am planning on retiring at the end of this year," he said, "I'd like to see it done late this year because of all the time and effort I have put into it."

AT&T to offer phone, TV, Internet services with Time Warner cable

By BRUCE MEYERSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — AT&T Corporation joined with Time Warner Inc. on Monday in its drive to use cable TV wires to provide one-stop shopping for television, telephone and Internet service.

The two companies announced a deal to offer local and long-distance telephone service, cable television and high-speed Internet access over Time Warner's cable systems in 33 states.

Combined with earlier moves—namely AT&T's purchase of cable TV company Tele-Communications Inc.—the deal will allow AT&T to offer these services to 40 percent of U.S. households, or 35 million homes, within five years, the companies said.

It also marks another big step by AT&T back into the business of local phone service, which it left after being broken up by the government in 1984.

AT&T and Time Warner will form a joint venture that will begin offering the new service in one or two cities by the end of 1999. It will begin broader commercial operations next year.

Customers will pay about 20 percent less for the venture's package of long-distance and local-phone service than what other vendors potentially could offer, AT&T chief executive C. Michael Armstrong told industry analysts Monday.

"We will be the low-cost provider compared to any other way to deliver these services, and we will be putting together more bundles on top of what we're announcing today," Armstrong said.

While AT&T's moves are among the most ambitious, it will face some big competitors.

Big cable companies, such as Cox Communications, are starting to offer local phone service over their cable lines. Satellite television companies, such as DirecTV, are partnering with regional phone companies to provide a bundle of similar services. Numerous high-tech companies are developing technologies to offer phone service over the Internet.

Nonetheless, shares rose Monday on the news of the merger. AT&T was up 3 to 93 3/4 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Time Warner was up 1 3/8 to 68 7/8.

AT&T will own more than three-quarters of the joint venture. AT&T estimates it will spend $600 million on the venture in the first two years. In addition, it will spend between $300 and $500 to equip each home to handle telephone services over cable lines.

Time Warner will get monthly fees from the venture ranging from $1.50 to $6 per home over six years.

The companies expect the arrangement to generate annual sales of $4 billion after three years.

AT&T has been trying to break into the $110 billion local phone market, while its share of the long-distance business is slipping to rivals like MCI Worldcom and Sprint.

In addition to the acquisition of TCI, the nation's second-largest cable company, AT&T spent $11.3 billion last year on Teleport Communications, a smaller local phone company.

AT&T's acquisition of TCI is expected to be completed this spring, and it is talking with other cable operators about deals but declined to elaborate.

1 killed, several injured in explosion, blaze at Ford plant; 3 still missing

DEARBORN, Mich. — Fire broke out about 1 p.m. Monday at a power station at a Ford Motor Co. plant, killing one worker and injuring several others.

Crews battled the blaze for hours. "This is the worst day of my life," Chairman William Clay Ford Jr. said.

The explosion and fire occurred at Ford's River Rouge Complex, the company's largest concentration of employees and factories and the home of several suppliers.

The coal-powered plant produces electricity for the entire complex, generating enough power to serve a city the size of Boston, Ford spokesman Michael Vaughn said. The Rouge complex is where Ford builds Mustangs.

Hours after the fire began, thick smoke and flames still were visible from the building.

"It's awful," Ford said. "Everyone who works at Ford is an extended member of the family. This is the worst day of my life."

Jerry Sullivan, president of the United Auto Workers Local 600, said he saw a number of severely injured people when he went to the scene.

"I haven't seen something like that since my days in Vietnam," he said.

According to the company, three workers remain unaccounted for.

Oakwood Hospital treated 11 patients from the fire and transferred 10 others elsewhere because of the severity of their burns, said Dr. Gary Christopher, director of emergency services at Oakwood.

Of those treated at Oakwood, six to eight had severe burns over 60 percent to 80 percent of their bodies.

"Several of these gentlemen were thrown by the blast and suffered various head injuries," Christopher said.

Garden City Hospital received one patient, public relations director Terry Carroll said.

The cause of the fire was being investigated.

A spokeswoman for Michigan Consolidated Gas Co. said the gas was shut off at the complex, a standard procedure, and there was no evidence the explosion was gas-related.

The Michigan Department of Consumer and Industry Services also sent two inspectors to the site, spokeswoman Maura Campbell said.

Hourly workers on duty at the complex were sent home while second shift workers were told not to report to work. About 4,000 employees were there at the time, Ford spokesman Jim Vella said.

The power house where the fire broke out was built in 1921 and is listed on the National Register of Historic Places.

Track men, women lose in Nebraska

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Nebraska Cornhuskers got the best of the K-State Track and Field team this weekend at the Nebraska Triangular, defeating both the men's and women's teams.

K-State's women's team lost its undefeated record, placing second behind Nebraska, while the men's team placed third, behind both Nebraska and Abilene Christian.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said they had competed in the meet not to win, but to gain experience and prepare for the Big 12 Conference and NCAA meets.

Some of the women's athletes who might have altered the outcome of the meet, senior Alexis Simmons and sophomore Annie Wetterhus, did not compete due to minor injuries.

ROVELTO

"It was a pretty solid team effort. The women were beaten by Nebraska, but, you know, we did not enter the meet with the idea that we were going to win," Rovelto said. "The fact that we still had a shot at winning the meet without those people speaks volumes for how solid the women's team is."

The women's team, scoring 96 points in the meet to Nebraska's 155, maintained its first-place NCAA power ranking this week, while the men's team, who scored 60 points behind Nebraska's 120.5 and Abilene Christian's 96.5, dropped to 13.

Rovelto said he was pleased with his women's distance runners, particularly sophomore Amanda Crouse, who placed first in the mile, and senior Emily Diederich, who placed first in the 800 meter run. Diederich, however, was not entirely satisfied with this showing.

"I ran a little too tentatively. I need to not be so tentative and be more decisive. That comes with time, too, toward the end of the year," Diederich said. "I know that we've done a lot of training, I know the strength is there, it's just a matter of going out there and running harder."

On the men's side, Rovelto witnessed strong showings by his multi-event athletes. Both senior Attila Zsvoczky and freshman Thomas Weiler earned personal records in the shot put, pole vault, and 60-meter hurdles, while junior Justin Robinson earned a personal record in the hurdles as well.

"Their marks are extremely good for multi-event athletes, and it shows that they're getting ready for big scores in the conference meet," Rovelto said.

This weekend, part of the team will return to Nebraska, while others will go to Iowa State.

Because of Iowa State's 300-meter track, Diederich expects better times on this larger track.

"I'd like to run fast," Diederich said. "I think all of us going to Iowa State have some hopes of getting good times. That's our goal. I guess I'm just anxious to run fast."

The conference meet, which will be at K-State Feb. 19 and 20, features a 200-meter track. The athletes returning to Nebraska will get more practice on the 200-meter track.

Rovelto said the team is at the point in training where they are concerned with improving times in preparation for the conference meet.

"This weekend we expect to see good performances," Rovelto said. "We're, for the most part, past our high-volume stages of training in all the event areas, so from this point on, the emphasis from a training standpoint is quality performances and rest."

Expectations were high when the Jayhawks came to Manhattan Monday night. For once, they were beatable. But after a 23-point loss, Wildcat coaches and players admitted their performance left ...

Poor shooting plagues Cats in loss

■ Asbury takes 'full responsibility' for defeat.

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For five years, the K-State men's basketball team has failed to defeat the Kansas Jayhawks.

For 16 years, the Wildcats have failed to drop KU in Manhattan. Wildcat faithful hoped and dreamed for this streak to end last night at Bramlage Coliseum. It was not to be.

Instead, KU put together a 22-5 run with 6:18 left to go in the second half and forced K-State to shoot a lowly 31 percent from the floor to pummel the struggling Cats 69-46 in front of the largest Bramlage crowd of the season.

K-State's 46 total points represented the second-lowest point total of the season as K-State lost its 16 consecutive game to the Jayhawks, who are 11-0 at Bramlage. The 23-point loss at home was the Wildcats' worst defeat at home against KU since 1990.

"I want to apologize to our fans and students for that performance," head coach Tom Asbury said. "I wasn't prepared for that. We did not perform well. I have no excuses. I take full responsibility for it, because I'm the guy."

Besides poor shooting, the Cats turned over the ball 15 times. KU shot 43 percent from the floor and hit 60 percent from the three point arc in the second half.

K-State, which had been first in the Big 12 conference in rebounding, was out rebounded by KU 43-41 for the fourth time in 22 games.

"We have to give them credit," Asbury said. "They obviously played a lot better than we did. There should be no excuses. We just didn't get it done. You can't get out-rebounded, especially when you shoot 31 percent."

KU won their second straight game to move to 15-6 overall and 7-2 in the Big 12 Conference while K-State continues its conference woes to move to 14-8 overall and 3-6 in the Big 12 conference.

KU head coach Roy Williams was quick to give his team's defense the credit for the victory.

"I'll go right to our defense," he said. "We take a lot of pride in what we do defensively. You talk about Kansas State leading the league in field-goal defense and being ranked in the top five in the nation in rebounding margin."

"We knew it was going to be a defensive game, and we challenged them on that," he said.

The Wildcats had only two players in double figures with seniors Manny Dies and Ayome May both putting up 12 point efforts.

Dies also pulled down nine rebounds.

KU was led by sophomore guard Kenny Gregory, who chipped in 16 points and eight rebounds.

"It hurts a lot," May said. "It's embarrassing. We didn't do anything well. We just didn't compete. KU played harder than we did. They wanted to win. It's as simple as that."

The first half started close as the Wildcats struck first blood on a Dies field goal. KU answered on threes from freshman Jeff Boschew and senior guard Ryan Robertson to notch the game at eight a piece.

After junior Nick Bradford tossed in a bucket, freshman guard Marlon London rolled in five consecutive points to put the Jayhawks ahead by eight. The lead was ten before Dies cut the Wildcat deficit to four on a jumper, but the Jayhawks kept the pace to go on a 12-3 run to end the half at 35-22.

Although the Cats were trailing at half, Asbury still thought his team could come back and pull out a victory.

"I thought we could get back in it," he said. "I think we are capable and experienced enough to pull out a comeback."

In the second half, the Jayhawks kept their engines going to reel off a 10-2 run while K-State sputtered and failed to hit a field goal until three minutes into the half.

Failing to score frequently inside basket, the Wildcats never found their stroke and KU increased their advantage to as many as 22 points before putting the Cats away for good.

"This is probably the most disappointing loss of the year," senior guard Josh Reid said.

"We thought we were ready. We just came out flat. It's been a pretty inconsistent year but this team is never going to say never," Reid said.

ERIC CRANE

After making a somewhat unfulfilling prediction in this year's Super Bowl, I have been led to think about a few things during these dreary days. I say dreary because the only sports we have to watch now are the NRBA, (Not Really Basketball Association) and the NHL. Oh well, onward and upward. Here's my post-Super Bowl gripe list for the week.

#1. Chris Chandler, Atlanta quarterback, choked miserably. Atlanta had more than one chance to make the game interesting. Can you say THREE interceptions?

#2. Eugene Robinson, Atlanta's cornerback, charged with soliciting an undercover cop with $40 for oral sex. Eugene, I would have given you 40 clams to get some sleep so you wouldn't have been burned for an 80-yard touchdown. Didn't you learn anything from Clinton?

#3. I'm sick of hearing about John Elway. I'm sick of pre- and post-game shows. A seven-hour pre-game show? Can this get any more ludicrous? To top it all off, I saw several Internet articles Monday morning about how poor the advertising was. Since when did the ads become huge news? I understand the concept, not the fascination. Sorry.

#4. Post-victory celebrations that end up in fires, tear gas and riots. People in Denver, Greeley and even Grand Junction, Colo., were having bonfire and window-breaking celebrations after Denver's victory. Drunks spilled out of the bars into the streets, trashing downtown. I think these idiots can share the "bonehead of the week" award along with Mr. Robinson.

#5. People with out-of-control opinions. Let me explain below.

Being a good writer means being well-informed. I have been checking vast sources of information all week long, 23 hours a day, just to bring you some ray of sunshine in the sports world, or maybe even in your daily life. The hour break in my day, by the way, is usually reserved for sobbing miserably after hearing of things like No. 2 and No. 4.

If you want to know more about the lack of control some people have, go to a sports news site and check out a little delight called "message boards."

These little technological marvels are where mindless Internet zealots can go and post some of the most idiotic and ignorant things you have ever seen. As your eyes grace this article with their presence, there are crazy Denver fans arguing with anyone who will listen about next year's Super Bowl. What a colossal waste of time. Granted, this is America, free speech and all that jazz, but there should be some type of common courtesy here.

I predicted Atlanta could pull the upset, and I still think it could have happened if some people would have been focused and if the quarterback didn't choke. Denver is a great team, and I don't want to take anything from them; two straight championships is a great accomplishment.

I guess I picked Atlanta more so because of my eternal hate for Denver, plus Atlanta was hot and had a lot to play for. They had put up a good fight against Minnesota and won, while Denver looked a little shaky going in.

What it comes down to is this. I picked Atlanta, and they lost. I admit it. The sun will rise tomorrow and little Orphan Annie sings. No love is lost, no harm, no foul and any other SportsCenter cliché applies.

Some people have the hardest time with this aspect of being a fan. They can't admit they are wrong. Check these message boards. If one person disagrees with them, then they will put 16 replies on the board saying how stupid they are and how they are right, blah, blah, blah.

I guess the moral of today's story has two points. One is ... I hate Denver. Just kidding. The first is, when your team wins, it's not an excuse to commit arson. The second is, don't be a sports-talk offender. Have an opinion, but don't make others have yours.

BIG MONDAY BUST

K-State's field-goal shooting woes lead to 23-point, nationally-televised loss

BY JOSHUA KINDER

K-State's lackluster performance on ESPN's "Big Monday" proved to be one of the worst of the season. The field goal shooting was the second lowest of this year and the team's leadership was questioned.

In the 23-point loss, the Cats shot just 31 percent from the field, beating only their performance against Clemson Nov. 25, when they shot a dismal 28.6 percent.

Although head coach Tom Asbury acknowledged KU's winning performance, he said the Wildcats' confidence level was not consistent.

"Give them credit," Asbury said of KU. "They came in and played very well, and very confident. We didn't play with any degree of confidence after the first 10 minutes.

"We panicked. We didn't execute offensively, didn't stay with the game plan, didn't step up."

Junior guard Josh Reid said he felt that when the team started missing the shots, K-State was unable to produce the necessary leaders to knock off the Jayhawks.

"A lot of guys were real focused before the game, but I think maybe we were trying too hard," Reid said following the game. "After the shots weren't falling for us, a lot of our leaders, myself included, kind of disappeared."

With Monday's game being the worst loss to KU in Manhattan since 1990, the Cats' Ayome May echoed sighs of disappointment on the team's performance and defensive letdown.

"Since I've been here they haven't beaten us like that," May said.

"That's why it's so disappointing right now.

"I don't think we played good defense at all. We had a lot of break-

KU'S HOME AWAY FROM HOME

KU is undefeated at Bramlage Coliseum since it opened in 1966 and has not lost in Manhattan since January 29, 1983. The streak has spanned more than 15 years and four coaches. Here's the breakdown of the Bramlage years:

downs. We've been going over them all week. We were well prepared for them," he said.

This was the second home game loss of the season for the Wildcats, who take pride in their impressive home record.

"The sad thing is that the two real stinkers that we've had almost the entire year were right here at home," Asbury said.

"That's very, very bothersome. That bothers me. I hope it bothers our guys greatly."

Students use games as alternative

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Students are finding other ways to spend their evenings besides drinking alcohol in many K-State residence halls.

Some of these residents may choose to spend their evenings playing cards or renting movies, but video and computer games have become increasingly popular, and resident assistants in the halls said they find these games to be good alternatives to drinking.

"Ping-pong, pool, video games... all these things give people something to do besides getting drunk," said Chad Lindsley, junior in secondary education and Haymaker Hall resident assistant. "Besides, when you're a college student, you don't always have the money to go out."

Playing such games can become more than just a way to avoid alcohol, however, and obstacles from various game systems.

"We usually go on the Internet and look for players from all over, but we like to coordinate the whole floor and play that way even better," Mike McDonough, Goodnow resident and junior in computer engineering, said.

McDonough and other Goodnow residents are preparing for the "Quake 2" tournament, a part of the Goodnow Floor Wars, on Feb. 4. This event will allow students from different parts of the hall to link their computers as they compete against each other in this game of shooting skill.

In a few cases, these floor-wide video game events can last longer than just one game.

"Our systems stay on about six or eight hours a day," Nick Stanberry, Haymaker resident and sophomore in kinesiology, said. Stanberry said he and his friends on Haymaker's seventh floor divide their time between a Nintendo 64 and a PlayStation system and get involved in a game pretty quickly.

While most students play video games solely for recreation, it can easily become a habit for others.

"For some people, it's a healthy outlet, but for others, it's all they do," George Widenor, Moore Hall resident life coordinator, said. "Every year, I see that one person who would rather stay in their room with their games rather than socialize."

Video and computer games can be an amusing diversion for an hour or two, but Widenor said players should realize there is more to college life than the inside of a residence hall room.

What it all adds up to, Lindsley said, is a habit that at least keeps students in the residence halls away from alcohol on the weekends.

"I can see it hurting their studies, but alcohol hurts it more," Lindsley said.

Docents dedicate time, interpret art for visitors to Beach museum

By JUSTIN VANNES
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Part of a museum's day-to-day operations is facilitating tours for guests. The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art has an opportunity for students and Manhattan residents to help out with tours.

The museum has a docent program. Students and others in the community can learn how to give tours to the variety of groups that visit the museum.

Docents have been giving tours of art museums since the late 19th century when major museums in Europe and North America realized the need for interpretive staff for their pieces.

Now, museums, including the Beach Museum, have volunteer staffs to provide tours for their works.

The museum presently has 15 active docents, two are K-State students.

"We have a mix of volunteers for the docent program," said Kathrine Walker Schlageck, education and public programs coordinator for the Beach Museum. "We have several teachers and a couple of students. We also have several former instructors who are retirees. They have the schedules that allow them to be the most flexible."

The docent program has been active for about two years, since the Beach Museum opened in October 1996.

Time and interest are both needed to be successful in the program, Schlageck said. Prospective docents must undergo a year of training before he or she even gives their first tour.

"You have to dedicate a little bit of time each month to go to the docent meetings and the training sessions," said Suzanne Hale, graduate student in painting and a Beach Museum docent.

The training is divided into two parts. First is art history training, covering the various styles and types of art that could be displayed. The second is more practical training on how to give tours.

The museum uses its docents for the many tours provided to groups that visit every year. "We have about 20,000 visitors a year," Schlageck said. "About 50 percent of those are tours for the university or for the public schools."

The program also is valuable to the docents themselves, Hale said. "Being a docent is a really good learning experience," she said. "It is good to help you with public speaking."

Being a docent also has its rewards, Hale said. "I like being around original art objects," she said. "It is nice to see people get excited about being around art, too."

Opportunities to volunteer at the museum also are available.

"It is such a learning experience," Hale said. "It would be nice to see more K-State students involved in the docent program."

Schlageck said the docent plays a large role in the operations of the museum.

"Docents are a vital part of the museum," Schlageck said. "It is nice to have students who support and docents who serve the museum."

Anyone interested in a tour of the museum or in being a docent can contact Schlageck at 532-7718.

'Varsity Blues' realistic portrait of small-town high school sport

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The No. 1 box office release last week, "Varsity Blues," shows many realities of playing football in a state where football is worshipped.

Brian Robbins (Nickelodeon's "Good Burger," and "Kenan & Kel") produced and directed this film about a tyrannical coach obsessed with winning and the group of young men he leads.

The story focuses on Jonathan "Mox" Moxon, played by James Van Der Beek ("Dawson's Creek"). Mox is the backup quarterback behind all-star Lance Harbor (Paul Walker). Mox is an intelligent kid with dreams of attending an Ivy League school and getting out of West Canaan, Texas. On the sideline, he hides a Kurt Vonnegut book in his playbook and secretly reads it during games.

Mox loves to play football for the pure enjoyment of it, but pressure from his father and a personality conflict with Coach Bud Kilmer (Jon Voight) leaves him unconcerned about his lack of playing time.

Kilmer has won two state championships, 22 division titles and wants No. 23, even if it means playing guys who are injured. His negligence causes Harbor to suffer a career-ending injury, but Kilmer blames overweight lineman Billy Bob (Ron Lester) for the injury.

Mox is inserted as the starting quarterback and finally gets to show his stuff. He guides the team to victory after Harbor's injury, then after winning the next game by a 66-3 score, he is instantly becomes the town hero. He is forced to deal with the pressure of being the starting quarterback and his continued battle with Kilmer.

The movie seems like a realistic situation through its many characters.

There is the fun-loving Billy Bob, who struggles with being overweight, and Coach Kilmer seems all too real as a high school coach who has let winning give him a big head. The community where all talk centers on the high school football team, accurately portrays a small Texas town.

The most startling reality was the fathers in the show. The fathers of Mox and Harbor could be found at any high school football stadium on autumn nights in any city in America. The two fathers desperately were holding on to their past glory as football players, while at the same time pushing their sons to the limit.

The movie is entertaining and amusing enough to be called a comedy, but it also can be classified as a drama. For those who played high school sports, "Varsity Blues" might be reminiscent of the insanity and fun of high school athletics. For those who did not play sports, it might be a fascinating look at a world you didn't understand.

Former panther party leader to speak tonight

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twenty-five years ago, Elaine Brown became the first and only woman to lead the controversial Black Panther Party. Tonight she will share her experiences and beliefs with K-State students.

Brown, the keynote speaker for Black History Month, is slated to speak at 7 p.m. in the Union Little Theatre.

"The topic I was given to speak about was 'Remembering the past, forging the future,'" Brown said, quoting the theme of K-State's Black History Month. "I'll be addressing that issue from an abstract point of view."

She said her goal is to educate people that more needs to be done for economic and racial equality, saying, "Americans have fallen asleep and need to wake up again."

"I hope to reflect upon why we even have a Black History Month," she said. "I'll talk about what this long history has meant, what problems still exist and what might be done to remedy the situation."

Dawnielle Robinson, coordinator of Multicultural Student Organizations, said Brown will be a good speaker because of her experiences. Robinson's office, Black Student Union and the Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development are sponsoring the lecture. "When we were discussing this," Robinson said, "we thought maybe people hadn't heard of her — but they should. We've brought in a lot of men in the past, and this is a great opportunity to get a woman's point of view."

In 1992, Brown published her memoir, "A Taste of Power: A Black Woman's Story." The book recounts her life from childhood to her leadership of the Black Panther Party.

"We were a paramilitary group, meaning we operated like the military," Brown said. "We had weapons, but they were used for self-defense. That a woman would be in charge of such an organization was unusual."

Brown joined the party in April 1968 and moved up the ranks first as a local deputy minister of information, then as editor of the party's newspaper and next as minister of information. When the group's leader, Huey Newton, went to Cuba to avoid being prosecuted for the murder of a prostitute, Brown became chairman of the party in 1974.

Brown now lives in Atlanta and is the president and founder of Fields of Flowers Inc., a non-profit corporation that is trying to create a model school for impoverished children.

Rebels refuse to attend peace talks in Yugoslavia

By ELLEN KNICKMEYER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia — U.S. and European envoys failed Monday to win a commitment from Kosovo's rebels to attend peace talks, described as the last chance for the combatants to resolve their differences.

In another sign the talks are far from a done deal, President Slobodan Milosevic's government in Belgrade said the hard-line Serbian parliament will decide Thursday whether the Serbs will show up for Saturday's conference in Rambouillet, France.

Hard-liners loyal to Milosevic and ultranationalists led by Vojislav Seselj hold a majority in the legislature, which last year resoundingly rejected foreign mediation of the Kosovo conflict.

Seselj repeated his opposition to the conference Monday, despite threats from NATO to negotiate peace or face allied airstrikes.

Deputy Yugoslav Premier Vuk Draskovic said, however, that "I believe our response must be 'Yes.'"

"The whole world wants us to go, and to say 'No' would mean working to our own detriment," Draskovic said.

Last week, the United States and five European powers summoned the warring sides to the conference table to negotiate an end to the 11-month conflict. The solution was based on a U.S. formula that would grant Kosovo expanded autonomy but not independence for a three-year period.

After that, the parties could review the status of Kosovo, a province in Yugoslavia's main republic of Serbia. Ethnic Albanians make up 90 percent of Kosovo's 2 million people, and the majority want independence.

NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana has been authorized to launch military action in Yugoslavia if the initiative fails to produce negotiations in a week and a settlement by Feb. 19.

In a strongly worded statement Monday, the Yugoslav government said NATO has no "right to use force against sovereign and independent countries."

White House lawyers had argued to the Senate that on other occasions, Lewinsky said Clinton had no reaction.

■ In a middle-of-the-night conversation on Dec. 17, 1997, Clinton told her she was on the witness list in Paula Jones' sexual harassment lawsuit, suggested she could file an affidavit and mentioned their previously arranged cover stories to explain why she was coming to see the president.

Lewinsky filed a false affidavit denying an affair.

Bryant would not discuss the substance of the questioning, which lasted far less than the eight hours set aside by the Senate, but he said he "felt it was a productive session."

BUDGET

but the two sides are already fighting over how to do that.

While Republicans want to use most of the remaining surpluses — nearly $800 billion over 10 years — largely to cut income tax rates, Clinton said he prefers aiming that money at Medicare, new retirement investment accounts, and defense and domestic programs.

Rather than broadly trimming tax rates, Clinton proposed $36.2 billion in narrowly targeted tax cuts over the next five years. They include a new $1,000 tax credit to help people afford long-term care for elderly or disabled relatives and a credit of up to $500 for stay-at-home parents of babies under age 1.

Because budget rules require many spending increases to be paid for, Clinton would raise taxes by $82 billion through 2004.

On several occasions, Lewinsky asked Bryant to be more specific in his questions, several sources said.

Six senators — three Republicans and three Democrats — sat in on the session, with two at a time acting as referees.

The videotape was to be made available to the rest of the Senate beginning at 7 a.m. CST today.

Presidential friend Vernon Jordan will be questioned today and White House aide Sidney Blumenthal will be questioned Wednesday in depositions in a private room at the Capitol.

At one point in Monday's session, private presidential attorney Nicole Seligman read a statement that apologized to Lewinsky "on behalf of the president for all the trouble the investigation and impeachment trial had caused her," one of the sources said.

After senators view the tape — available for their viewing at four Capitol sites — excerpts could end up being shown as part of the trial, which will resume Thursday.

Or senators could vote to bring Lewinsky to the floor for live testimony about her relationship with Clinton and attempts to conceal it, a less likely development.

If senators decide that viewing the videotapes provides all the information they need, they can proceed to closing arguments in the perjury and obstruction case.

In previous votes, Democrats have demonstrated more than enough strength to block conviction and removal of the president by the required two-thirds vote.

With the large crowd, Bramlage workers had a bigger job than normal.

"The more people here, the more problems," said Judd Herbst, usher and sophomore in pre-law. "People sitting in the wrong seats and taking other people's tickets can be problems."

Many fans said a loss would be a let-down to the team as well as fan support.

"This is the key game of the season," David Neely, freshman in management information systems, said. "A loss in front of the huge crowd would not be good in gathering team support."

As the game wore on, Opat said only one key improvement could help the Wildcats finally beat their rivals.

"The game could be better if they would just get their heads together," Opat said. "Every time KU comes to town, they lose their heads."

CENSUS

preferred this approach, whereas Republicans feared the sampling method.

"The sampling method is scientifically valid," said Dallas E. Johnson, head of the K-State Department of Statistics. "The thing that lighted the fire of the debate was that Republicans do not want an accurate count."

John A. Fliter, assistant professor of political science, said experts speculate that California and Texas would have gained seats, whereas Connecticut, Massachusetts or Minnesota would have lost power in the House of Representatives.

"The Supreme Court's decision will probably have no major influence on Kansas' reapportionment," Fliter said.

"Kansas does not have many urban areas, where people could be missed."

A follow-up study found that the actual enumeration in the census of 1990 had missed more than 4 million people entirely, many of them in minority groups or children.

"The issue, whether using the sampling method or not, should have never gone to the Supreme Court. It is ridiculous," said Edward Spar, executive director of the Council of Professional Associations on Federal Statistics. "They're gonna raise garbage."

The pricetag for the census before the Supreme Court's decision came to $4 billion. A one-by-one headcount could cost another $1 billion.

But the Supreme Court's decision could mean more money for students working for the census. The headcount would require more part-time workers.

Lack of volunteers puts crisis center in jeopardy

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A campus crisis center that's known for helping people in need is now facing its own crisis.

The Phone Crisis Center, a phone service for people who need someone to talk to, is on the brink of extinction because of a lack of volunteers and staff.

Since the 1980s, the number of volunteers and staff members has been declining, said Tony Jurich, member of the center's advisory board and professor of family studies and human services.

Before the winter break, the center still had almost 40 volunteers, volunteer Lana Franco said.

Now there are three. Almost all the staff members also turned in their resignations, said Carolyn McClaskey, staff adviser and library assistant at Hale Library.

McClaskey said the workers left due to time constraints with work and studying for finals.

The center's phone lines are open from 5 p.m. to 8 a.m. every day, Franco said, but there are many unstaffed hours.

With only three volunteers, many callers are getting only the answering machine, she said.

Franco said the number of callers has been decreasing because callers are discouraged about not being able to speak with anyone.

"People don't try to call anymore," she said.

The center is averaging only about five calls per day.

Franco said that when callers reach a volunteer, they often complain about the lack of service when needed. She said she's frustrated there aren't enough people to answer the phones during phone hours, especially when someone has an emergency like thoughts of suicide.

With the lack of staffing, there are also too few people to help out with difficult emergency calls.

Crystal Morrison, senior in psychology and social work and former volunteer for the center, said she once had an emergency call that she was untrained to handle. She said she tried to get hold of an adviser or a staff member who could tell her what to do, but she had to wait for two hours to get a response from someone.

"I didn't know what to do," Morrison said. "I got frustrated with everything that was going on."

She said she recently quit because of time conflicts with school and because the center was demanding too much of her time. With the volunteer shortage, Morrison said she and the other members of the center had to cover extra shifts and do extra work.

"Some of us felt like we were getting taken advantage of," Morrison said.

Former assistant coordinator Rachael Ball, senior in family studies, said the center expected too much of its volunteers and workers.

Ball said staff members had to be on call a lot, which meant they couldn't leave town or be away from the phones. They also had to work holidays.

"Too much is expected of the staff," Ball said. "The staff is all students, and we're all taking classes. We can't do everything."

The center has been accepting applications for staff members and volunteers, but McClaskey said the positions aren't being filled.

"I just don't have the staffing," she said.

Shannon Sjogren, senior in secondary education and former staff coordinator for the center, was in charge of

Gingrich to talk on human rights

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Human rights activist Candace Gingrich, sister of former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, will speak at 7 p.m. Thursday in the Union Main Ballroom.

Gingrich, who is the manager of the Human Rights Campaign National Coming Out Project, has spoken about gay and lesbian issues since her brother was elected House speaker.

Tamara Hawk and Brenda Hanger, of Hawk and Hanger Productions, are responsible for bringing Gingrich to K-State. Hawk and Hanger provide seminars, conferences and workshops to social workers and members of other professions. The women, who are independent social workers, said their goal is to educate and enlighten the public about human rights.

"Candace Gingrich gives voice and visibility to gays and lesbians," Hanger said. "A lot of gay people can't do this for fear of what happened to Matthew Shepard or for fear of losing their job or whatever else."

Gingrich will talk about the Human Rights Campaign Agenda, including hate-crime legislation, discrimination issues on college campuses and sexual harassment and will take questions from the audience. She also will speak about Kansas issues, such as Emporia State University's ruling on the removal of

Majors fair provides options for students

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first Academic Majors Fair will be today in the K-State Student Union Grand Ballroom.

"The Power of Possibility" is from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. and is open to all students who are seeking a major, minor or secondary major. Students who are thinking about changing their academic focus also are encouraged to attend.

"This is a student's chance to gather the necessary information for the decision making process, as well as finding out what they can do with that major," said Nancy Kiefer, academic adviser for the College of Arts and Sciences' open-option program and co-chair of the fair.

The fair is an idea brought to K-State from other universities that have had success with similar events.

Every college and several departments will be in attendance, and more than 50 tables will be occupied by representatives from the various departments.

The representatives will meet with students and answer questions about curriculum requirements. They also will discuss options associated with a major and answer common questions that advisers receive about majors.

Kiefer said the most frequently asked questions are about clubs and activities associated with specific majors and future job options and advantages to having a minor.

Surveys were sent to 1,000 freshmen and sophomores, and response indicated it would be beneficial to have all the information under one roof.

"We see a need for an event focusing primarily on K-State students looking for majors and career options," said Tinsley Furry, coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center and co-chair of the event.

The most common complaint from students about their choice in majors is the class load isn't what they expected, Furry said.

"Most first- and second-year students are used to high school classes with a set curriculum," Kiefer said. "When they get here, it's like a whole new world with a whole new set of options."

There are about 1,200 students who don't know what academic path to pursue, Furry said the fair is set up to provide adequate information in order for students to make a well-informed decision.

Door prizes will be given out each half-hour throughout the day. Prizes include a $50 gift certificate, compact disc racks and free manicures.

The Academic and Career Information Center, the open-option program, the Union and each college are sponsoring the event.

"We want this to be a fun and informational event," Kiefer said. "These are important decisions students are faced with."

Elaine Brown, author of "A Taste of Power: A Black Woman's Story," and former leader of the Black Panther Party, speaks Tuesday evening in the K-State Student Union Little Theatre. Brown was the keynote speaker for Black History Month.

Elaine Brown started her speech Tuesday night asking why America still needs a Black History Month.

To answer her own question, she spent an hour explaining how history has affected people's inability to reach the American dream.

Brown, the author of "A Taste of Power: A Black Woman's Story," and the only woman to lead the Black Panther Party, gave the keynote speech for Black History Month in Union Little Theatre. She spoke little about her experiences with the group, but instead used her speech as a wake-up call for those in attendance.

"Somewhere along the line we have fallen asleep," she said. "We still walk around saying that the economy is wonderful. How is the economy wonderful when 1 percent of the population owns 80 percent of the wealth?"

To explain how America got to this point, she gave a history lesson, starting with the slave trade in the 1600s.

"Most people now are like, 'It's not my fault, I never put anybody into slavery,'" she said. "Well it's not my fault, either, but I've been bearing the weight of it for a very long time, as an individual and as a member of group."

Brown said slavery caused a division that still is affecting America. Although she said affirmative action has helped blacks, she said retribution would be a better remedy for the division.

"Where's our payback?" she asked. "Affirmative action? I'll take $20 million and never ask another question."

She said the Civil War, while freeing the slaves, also left the majority of blacks without any option but to return to the plantations and do the same labor they had been doing as slaves.

"It is hard for us now to remember what that was like," she said. "They took not only our bodies, but our memories. They took our sense of personhood, our song, our dance, our flag, our language, our mothers, our fathers, our history. It was erased."

Brown said the subsequent civil-rights movement, including the work of the Black Panther Party, has not been adequately taught in public schools.

"Most of you heard nothing about the Black Panther Party in public schools," she Online pro-life activists ordered to pay $170 million fine for threatening doctors

By LAUREN DODGE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORTLAND, Ore. — Pro-life activists who used an Internet site that advocated the killing of abortion doctors Tuesday by a federal jury that said the tactics amounted to threats.

The defendants, who included more than a dozen individuals and two pro-life organizations, said they will appeal. They also said the other side will be hard-pressed to collect because they have transferred their assets to make themselves "judgment proof."

"This is a moral and constitutional outrage," said one of the defendants, Catherine Ramey. "There is no threat and they knew it. We use picket signs — they use the courts."

The plaintiffs, who included Planned Parenthood and several abortion doctors and clinics, sued under a 1994 federal law that prohibits inciting violence against abortion doctors or their patients.

Unlike previous cases, this one did not involve any physical confrontations or explicit threats. Because of that, the pro-life activists contended the Internet site and the posters were protected by the First Amendment.

"The jury saw the posters for what they are — a hit list for terrorists," said Gloria Feldt, president of Planned Parenthood.

At issue

was a Web site called "The Nuremberg Files" that lists hundreds of abortion doctors accused of committing "crimes against humanity" and invites readers to send in doctors' addresses, license plate numbers and the names of their children.

When three doctors on the list were killed, their names were crossed off like items on a grocery list.

The jury took 4 1/2 days to reach its verdict, which consisted of $106.5 million in punitive damages and $500,000 in compensatory damages. As part of the tight security surrounding the case, the judge said the names of the eight jurors will never be made public.

Similar Wild West-style posters were handed out at rallies and in abortion doctors' neighborhoods, offering a $5,000 reward for information about a "Deadly Dozen" doctors.

During the three-week trial, abortion doctors on the list testified that they lived in constant fear, used disguises, bodyguards and bullet-proof vests, and instructed their children to crouch in the bathroom if they heard gunfire.

The defendants said they were simply political protesters collecting data on doctors in hopes of one day putting them on trial as Nazi war criminals were at Nuremberg. They said the materials contained no direct threats.

Afterward, some of the activists said the GOP attacks Clinton plans for taxes, Social Security

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Republicans took the offensive Tuesday against President Clinton's new $1.77 trillion budget, accusing the White House of advancing a dubious plan to save Social Security and proposing a tax-cut plan of their own.

A day after Clinton shipped his proposal to Congress, lawmakers were skeptical of Clinton's plan to use most of the $4.85 trillion in federal surpluses projected for the next 15 years to shore up Social Security.

"Only in Washington would this kind of creative accounting be considered," Sen. John Chafee, R-R.I., told Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin at a Senate Finance Committee hearing.

Referring to Rubin's previous career as an investment banker, Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, said that if Rubin had used "accounting like this in private practice, he would be in prison now rather than sitting before us."

Clinton has said he wants to revamp Social Security this year for the impending retirement of the nation's 76 million baby boomers.

California school sued for minority admission rights

SAN FRANCISCO — Civil rights groups sued the University of California, Berkeley on Tuesday on behalf of high-achieving minorities who were rejected, saying the university system's flagship campus overemphasizes test scores and advanced courses in admissions.

"This is an admissions process that grants preferences to the privileged," said attorney Joseph Jaramillo of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

The weight given to the Scholastic Assessment Test, an examination of English and math fluency, and advanced-placement grades has a discriminatory effect on blacks, Hispanics and Filipinos, and lacks educational justification, the suit said.

Advanced-placement courses, worth an additional grade point in UC admissions ratings, are far more available in predominantly white high schools, Jaramillo said.

"What advanced-placement and SAT scores don't show is talent and ability to succeed in college," said one of the plaintiffs, Justine Certeza, a freshman at UC San Diego who was rejected by Berkeley.

The lawsuit seeks court orders requiring Berkeley to admit Certeza and six other minority students and adopt an admissions policy that gives qualified blacks, Hispanics and Filipinos "a fair and equal opportunity."

Minority enrollment fell dramatically last fall in the first freshman class at Berkeley affected by a new regents action eliminating affirmative action.

Education supporters lobby for increased K-12 funding

TOPEKA — Citing the necessity for equality, education advocates urged legislators to provide more money to school districts at a hearing Tuesday before the Senate Education Committee.

Committee members, however, were uncertain about whether or not the state could provide enough funding.

"I think we have to be very careful," Chairperson Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, said. "Can we afford this?"

Among the requests, members of the State Board of Education recommended the state increase the base amount it gives school districts by $75 per student to $3,795 per student.

"All children in the state of Kansas deserve equal educational opportunities," said Scott Hill of Abilene, a member of the State Board of Education and the board's legislative coordinator.

Kent Hurn, chairperson of the United School Administrators and superintendent of Topeka's Seaman school district, suggested a $100-per-student increase to $3,820 per student.

Gov. Bill Graves has recommend a $35-per-student increase to $3,755.

Lawrence said after the hearing she is concerned about the cost of the Unified School Administrators' proposal, which would require $37.3 million more in per-pupil base spending than Graves' plan. Graves' plan would require an additional $20 million.

Sen. Christine Downey, D-Newton, announced on Monday that Senate Democrats would support a $100-per-student increase in the state's base spending.

Lawrence said the Education Committee likely will formulate its own plan and vote on it Feb. 10.

Studies discourage living together prior to marriage

NEW YORK — A growing body of research has found that contrary to popular belief, people who live together before marriage are more likely than other couples to divorce.

According to a report released this week from the National Marriage Project at Rutgers University, studies done over the past decade found the same connection between living together before marriage and splitting up after.

Many researchers said they believe the reason is partly that people who live together are more unconventional to begin with and are less committed to the institution of marriage and more open to the possibility of divorce.

The latest report said researchers suspect living together slowly erodes people's ability to commit and their faith in the institution of marriage.

"You get into a pattern that works against having a long-term, committed relationship," said Barbara Whitehead, co-director of the National Marriage Project.

After 14 beers, man uses cat's head as paperweight

JONESBORO, Ark. — A man got 60 days in jail for cutting the head off his estranged wife's cat and using it like a paperweight to hold down a threatening note to her.

Todd Anthony Looper, 31, was sentenced on Friday for cruelty to animals and terroristic threatening. He also was put on probation for a year and ordered to pay $510 in fines and court costs.

Pam Looper, 23, reported that someone broke into her house while she was gone Thursday and that she found the cat's head in her vehicle, with a note that read in part, "I'm going to give you a birthday like you never will forget." Looper told police that he had had 14 beers in three hours and did not remember hurting the cat but admitted the handwriting on the note looked like his. Pam Looper's birthday was Sunday.

Jordan questioned by house managers

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — House prosecutors questioned presidential friend Vernon Jordan on Tuesday and drew concessions they hope will bolster their case for live witnesses at the impeachment trial.

Senators also viewed Monica Lewinsky's videotaped deposition and gave the suggestion that they were underwhelmed.

Jordan, a Washington power broker, testified that President Clinton was directly behind his efforts to find Lewinsky a job. Jordan also altered his account of a meeting with Lewinsky that prosecutors have highlighted in their obstruction of justice inquiry.

The presidential confidant testified last spring he never had breakfast with Lewinsky, but the former intern testified she had such a breakfast Dec. 31, 1997, at a Washington hotel. She said she remembered it in part because Jordan suggested she should destroy drafts of her love letters to the president.

Last fall, Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr sent to Congress a receipt from the breakfast. Under questioning by House prosecutor Asa Hutchinson on Tuesday, according to several sources familiar with his testimony, Jordan said his recollection had been refreshed since his earlier grand jury appearance, and he conceded the breakfast occurred.

Jordan remained adamant he never instructed or suggested that Lewinsky destroy any love letters, the sources said, speaking on condition of anonymity. Lewinsky has stuck by her testimony that Jordan had told her to "go home and make sure they're not there." At the time, the letters were under subpoena.

The Jordan deposition at the Capitol was contentious at times, according to the sources, but White House lawyers asked only two questions. They asked none of Lewinsky on Monday.

The same sources said Jordan made clear in his latest testimony that the president was behind his efforts to find a job in New York for Lewinsky and that he gave it attention because he did not want to disappoint Clinton.

When Jordan's name first surfaced in the Lewinsky controversy, he issued a statement in January 1998 saying he conducted the job search at the behest of Oval Office secretary Betty Currie.

In his first grand jury appearance, in March, Jordan stuck to his account about Currie.

In later appearances, he said "I do believe that" the president told Currie to ask for the job help and that Clinton "knew that I had gotten her a job, he knew that I had gotten her a lawyer. ... He was interested in this matter. He is the source of it coming to my attention in the first place."

House prosecutors are hoping such evolutions or changes in testimony will bolster their case as they make one last-ditch effort to persuade senators to call witnesses for live testimony in the well of the Senate before the trial ends.

"It will be our intention to request live witnesses," said head prosecutor Henry Hyde, R-Ill., but none beyond the three who are providing depositions. White House aide Sidney Blumenthal will be questioned today.

Hyde said the Lewinsky and Jordan testimony had "strengthened some points" of the prosecution case.

Senators got their first chance Tuesday to see Lewinsky's videotaped testimony at four closed Capitol sites and came away suggesting there was little or nothing new, seemingly dimming the chance she will be called to the Senate floor.

"Based on what my staff told me, there is nothing new. If there in fact is nothing new, I would not expect her to be called" to testify in person, Robert Bennett, R-Utah said.

Larry Craig of Idaho, a member of the Republican leadership, responded "probably not" when asked whether there was anything to be gained in calling Lewinsky to appear.

If the Senate's 45 Democrats oppose live testimony, as expected, only six Republicans would have to join them to move the trial toward beginning closing arguments as early as this week:ad. The goal of both parties is to vote on the charges by Feb. 12.

Separately, senators and the White House were talking about a Republican proposal to allow some sort of trial statement that would declare Clinton had done wrong but would not remove him from office.

That found no favor among the Clinton defenders. Such a "finding of facts," said White House press secretary Joe Lockhart, "violates directly the Constitution."

City to use grant for water, sewer changes

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission unanimously approved six agenda items, most continuing city business addressed last fall, in its meeting Tuesday night.

In contrast to the audience that packed the room for the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board meeting on the Wal-Mart Supercenter proposal Monday, attendees at the commission meeting numbered less than 20.

The commission approved an interview committee's choice of HWS Consulting Group of Manhattan to begin design services for water and sewer improvements in the Northview area, particularly a neighborhood bordered roughly by Allen Road, Tuttle Street, Blaker Drive and Manfax Avenue.

The improvements will be funded through a grant accepted by the city earlier this year and could run about $200,000 water improvements and $100,000 on sewer work, Utilities Director Jack Messer said.

Residents of the area have complained of colored tap water and sewer discharges for years, possibly due to aged utility pipes.

An amendment to the animal ordinance that owners must leave a $10 deposit before picking up pets not vaccinated for rabies from the Animal Shelter also was approved.

The amendment also imposes fees of $10 for the first day and $15 for each additional day an animal is kept in the shelter.

One agenda item scheduled but dropped for the meeting was a proposal that would drop the local ordinances requiring Manhattan gun dealers to notify the Riley County Police Department within 24 hours of any gun sale.

The change also would drop the 48-hour waiting period before the buyer could pick up the gun while police checked the buyer's background.

Alvan Johnson, director of the Riley County Police Department, had proposed the change due to federal law enacted last fall requiring gun dealers to notify the FBI of sales, who would run background checks.

However, the change would have left no waiting period, one of the reasons Mayor Steve Hall said the commission decided to drop the item before the meeting.

Until Congress passes its new regulations, Hall said the commission saw no point in changing the ordinances.

Decision needed from local planning board

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board heard from concerned residents and Wal-Mart representatives about the possibility of a Wal-Mart Supercenter being constructed at the intersection of Southwind Place and Seth Childs Road.

Unfortunately, those residents and representatives did not hear from the planning board.

After five hours of dialogue for and against the proposal, board members abandoned the debate slightly before midnight and tabled discussion until March 1.

Instead, the board should have ended public debate an hour earlier and made a decision on whether or not Wal-Mart's proposal could proceed to the City Commission.

Public input is always a good idea, especially on a matter so important to the Manhattan community, but only so many new arguments can be presented in a span of five hours. When the discussion became tired and repetitive, the planning board should have done what it was appointed to do — make a decision.

Admittedly, it is a difficult task. It's tough to make a decision that will have such a profound effect on Manhattan. It's even tougher to look in the eyes of people at the meeting and essentially say their presentations weren't convincing enough.

But that's the board members' job. They are being put on the spot, but delaying the decision does not help either party.

MAINTAINING HONOR

Honor system to set standard of individual responsibility, personal honor, and integrity Honor.

It has a lot of meaning for five letters. Many of us associate honor with patriotism, the American flag or even our alma mater. Maybe a picture of a soldier receiving the Purple Heart helps us visualize this abstract word.

It is soon coming in a concrete way to K-State.

This fall semester marks the beginning of the honor system for most undergraduates.

The system will mean you as a student are given power and responsibility to guard both yourself and your peers against cheating. It means you will take greater responsibility to report incidents of dishonesty. It means pledging your word to uphold integrity and honesty in academics. It means taking a pledge to honor.

As with any new program or procedure, there are quirks and questions. Even opposition.

Last semester I sat in class and listened to many of my peers oppose implementing the honor system here at K-State. Not necessarily because they had cheated or planned to cheat, but mainly because they did not want pressure to "rat" on their classmates.

You might agree. I understand. "Ratting" might have an effect on you, so you make excuses:

"What would people think? What would people say? Would I be shunned?"

By the time you consider all the negative consequences that could happen, ignoring the entire situation would be all too easy. We need a good reason to convince ourselves that the honor code is worth upholding. Not only that, but what are we pledging to honor?

The answer is twofold.

The first is the integrity of the institution, or, in a greater sense, the integrity of the universal virtue itself. The problem — it's too vague and abstract. It is simple to justify not fulfilling your responsibility to report a cheat within the structure of the honor system, especially for the aforementioned cause.

For many students, the institution merely means the place that gives them their degree in a few years. Upholding some universal virtue of honesty means about as much as not stepping on an ant for fear of causing them all to go extinct.

Besides, most of us consider ourselves to have a general respect for the institution. There always are going to be honest people, and we ourselves are usually honest. So what does it matter?

This brings us to the second thing we pledge to honor when we sign the code — each other.

Now the thing we pledge to honor has a face, a personality and a name. You can no longer justify opposing such an honor system for reasons of vagueness. What you are pledging to honor suddenly becomes concrete. We are without excuse.

The honor code requires us to evaluate how much we care about the person we see cheating. It encourages us to not only remain honest ourselves, but also to show true compassion for our classmates, because anyone who chooses not to report a cheat under the honor code is gutless.

It takes nerve to "rat," but it takes nothing more than a person of wobbly character to remain silent. A cheat has entirely missed the concept of learning. What good will you do for them by being tight-lipped?

You are not likely to transform a cheater's life by reporting them, but you would provide a direct opportunity for that person to assess his or her actions. You might not even change cheaters' habits, but you do lay 100 percent of the responsibility upon their shoulders to evaluate not only what they are trying to achieve, but how they are getting it.

William J. Bennett was right when he said, "We are hesitant to impose upon ourselves a common moral code because we want our own exemptions."

The real reason K-State students oppose the honor system is not because they don't understand it. They oppose it because they don't care about their peers who commit acts of dishonesty. They oppose it because they are lazy.

They would rather go through school without causing trouble, and by doing so, are themselves in essence saying, "I don't care about them. I'm doing fine." Thus they rape the integrity of the institution, the virtue of honor and any compassion they might have had for their peer.

Honor must be protected and upheld if we are going to be successful people. For where there is honor, there is dignity, and where there is dignity, there is excellence.

Technology makes long-distance friendships easier

I have a friend. His name is Mike. He goes to the University of New Orleans and is a graduate student in engineering. He likes Celtic music, wants to build battleships when he grows up and can be a little goony around girls.

I couldn't pick him out of a line up if you paid me. I know he's tall and has an older brother. He also has a nice Texas accent.

I've only seen one picture of him, and let's be real, it could have been anybody. We've talked on the phone a couple of times, but it gets expensive, and we're both way more entertaining on paper than live.

For some reason, this guy is someone I count as a close friend. We've been e-mailing each other for about three years now.

When his mom got breast cancer, I helped him look for related Web sites and sent him every happy recovery story I could find.

When my marriage finally breathed its last breath, he e-mailed me three times a day for a week to tell me it would be OK and that I was still a good person, even though I didn't feel like one.

In the halls of great friendships I realize that three years is a drop in the bucket, but for me, this is something, especially considering the lifespan of most e-mail messages.

Mike has been there for me, and I think a lot of the reason why we are friends and stay friends is because we are not in each other's faces on a daily basis. There's a lot to be said for distance.

When you are writing, not talking, the important stuff comes to the top, and the daily grind sort of stays in the back. Plus, he and I are both basically shy people, and this e-mail thing is a godsend. I can be cool, or vampish or taller, and he can, re-edit his bon mots to his hearts content.

Relationships are changing in this day and age — there seems to be way less personal contact than before.

The debate is still out on whether this is a good thing.

I am basically a hermit. I can, and will, live in my head for days and be perfectly happy. My only interaction is with a keyboard and modem cord.

I often wonder what sort of effect this will have on people like me.

The shy have always been forced to learn to deal with others, and now we've been given a new wall to toss up between us and the world.

The trend of less contact has been moving into other areas, too. I recently saw a story about a young couple who chose to court rather than date.

Aside from courting sounding way more romantic than dating, the big difference was that they were not allowed to touch each other. No holding hands, no goodnight kisses, no friendly hugs. Nothing.

Granted, they had strong religious reasons for making the choices they did, but this approach is catching on.

I've been looking for that moment in history when contact became less of a prerogative.

I think it was sometime in the '80s when cordless phones became big. You could talk to someone while you took a bath, weeded the garden or painted your toenails, and no one was the wiser.

Somewhere along the way, the phones got smaller and e-mail became a requirement to function.

So now we are here, in an age when I have a good friend who doesn't know what color my eyes are but knows where I was when the Challenger exploded.

Is this good? I know I would never have met Mike if it had not been for the magic that is cyberspace. I'm not even sure you could say we have actually met, since we've never shaken hands.

One of these days we will. Or not. Either way, we'll be friends, real or imagined.

I love the new Wildcat 91.9. I used to always listen to the Lazer, but now that we actually have a modern rock station here at K-State, and it's actually rivaling KU's Lazer, I'm quite proud of what students here at K-State have done for us.

I think Black Student Union equating my race with rap music is a dangerous stereotype I don't want set for myself. I like the new radio station.

I'm not a member of a minority group; however, I do enjoy the urban tunes that used to be played on DB92. I think that they should be brought back. There's no other radio station in this region of Kansas that plays that kind of music, and I miss it. Bring back the urban rhythms.

I think the Collegian's priorities are a little skewed. Three-quarters of the front page were dedicated to the Super Bowl, which should have been in the sports section. The student stuff is more important than a football game. Meanwhile, another accident involving K-State students and alcohol was buried in the sports section.

READERS write

Previous mix of eclectic music should be returned

Editor,

I wanted to add my opinion to the discussion about KSDB-FM 91.9. Radio stations that I value provide an eclectic mix of music in their programming schedules. I enjoy listening to a station when the majority of the songs I hear I've never heard before and won't hear too often again. I enjoy music that is obscure, counter-cultural, diverse and interesting. When I first attended this school three years ago, I was impressed with the programming on DB92 but not anymore. I now listen to AM talk radio because I find the arrogance and sanctimony of Rush Limbaugh and Dr. Laura Schlessinger more interesting than the repetitive mass-market alterna-tripe that is on KSDB.

The majority of the music that I'm hearing on KSDB I can hear on other stations in the area. If something original isn't going to be put on the air, why bother?

I've always assumed that college stations were free from the homogenizing influence of paying their bills from advertising revenue, which dictates programming that pleases the greatest amount of people the greatest amount of time, but apparently KSDB isn't.

Help us all if this station decides to go all the way with its commercialized approach to pleasing the masses and starts playing the ultimate in banality and triteness, top-40 country.

I also agree wholeheartedly with Mary VanLeeuwen's column about the juvenile, embarrassing nature of the sound clips between songs. It's a shame that KSDB can only aspire to be like other stations — KLZR-FM 105.9, the Lazer, in terms of its music and KMKF-FM 101.5 in terms of its sound clips.

I encourage KSDB to set a course of its own and provide this community with something original, stimulating and interesting. Please spare us from hearing the same alterna-hit of the month time after time each and every day. Please consider the notion that ska means more than No Doubt, industrial means more than Trent Reznor and hip-hop means more than the Beastie Boys.

'Mildly racy' comments shouldn't offend students

Editor,

This letter is in response to Mary VanLeeuwen's column about KSDB-FM 91.9.

Let me start by saying that I, along with many others, like the new format. It gives Manhattan something it didn't have and also establishes an identity the previous format lacked due to its diversity. Diversity is a positive thing, but for a radio station it can hinder the development of a strong identity, which draws listeners.

I, for one, am quite surprised a junior in college would be this offended by mildly racy comments on the radio. If the word "ass" offends you at this age, then you might be in for a hard life. My suggestion to VanLeeuwen is that she tune in to any other rock, urban, country, alternative or Top-40 radio station and catch more of the same. The Wildcat 91.9 is not some new radical shock-jock radio station, as she seems to imply.

Although surprised, I can respect the fact that she might be offended by this. However, to say someone will judge all K-State students negatively because the campus radio station says "ass" is just a little extreme.

Also, comparing it to Dick Gregory's speech is probably extreme. I did not attend the speech, but I assume that he used slightly more harsh language than the terrible A-word.

In closing, I would also like to point out that this response typifies the ultra-politically-correct view that to offend anyone is a terrible thing. Lighten up.

If the worst thing you have to endure is hearing the word "ass" on the radio, then you probably lead a damn good life. Oops, hope the D-word didn't offend anyone.

Men's team needs strong 2nd half to secure NCAA bid

"I guess the only thing that really surprises me anymore about basketball is that people are ignorant enough to bet on it."

Forgive K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury for being frazzled. His team has just joined the dozens in the college basketball world directly atop the infamous bubble. The bubble is as familiar a concept to a college basketball fan as the hunk is to a soccer fan, or the number zero is to a soccer fan.

The bubble emerges about this time every year, as the NCAA Tournament begins to loom larger in the minds of programs across the country. It provides a convenient resting place for the fragile tournament hopes of teams that have squandered their nine lives a bit too early in the season and are hoping to tread water long enough to sneak into the post-season.

SMITH

K-State fits that bill to a T. An NCAA Tournament berth seemed close at hand early in the season, as Asbury and a class of talented newcomers looked to bring the Cats back toward the storied roots of their 22 previous tournament appearances — still good enough for 11th in the nation all-time.

They began the season with enormous promise, darting out to a 10-2 record in non-conference play, their only losses coming to then-No. 22 Clemson and then-No. 17 Indiana in the Maui Invitational Tournament.

Conference play, however, has been another story entirely. The Cats' inconsistency has earned them a 3-5 mark in league play, and left them in the bottom half of the Big 12 standings.

The sudden tailspin has given the Wildcats something to think about as they try to determine whether their season-long goal of tournament play is realistic.

"I think we need to think about where we are in the standings," junior guard Josh Reid said. "We never expected to be in this spot at this time of year."

With precious few games to play, Asbury said the Wildcats have little room left for error if they wish to achieve the goal of reaching the NCAA Tournament.

"We're going to have to make up some ground on the back stretch," he said. "Really all we can look at from a coaching perspective is where we are sitting in the standings and what do we need to do to get back in the race. Those are the things we really hone in on."

This year's quest for an NCAA tournament berth bears a special significance for the Wildcats. The team will lose six seniors — Manny Dies, Paco May, Shawn Rhodes, Ty Sims, Chris Griffin and Jay Heidrick — at the end of the season.

Rhodes, Dies and May all were members of the 1994 K-State squad, the last to make an appearance in the NCAA Tournament. Their experience is a key ingredient in the mix necessary for K-State to reach the tourney, and their desire to return could be the fuel that fires the engine.

"We've got a lot of seniors on this team, and we've only got a little while left to take advantage of our college basketball careers," senior center Shawn Rhodes said. "We want to go out and do it in the right style."

ESPN analysts said they and many other knowledgeable sources believe the Big 12 will send at most four teams this year to the NCAA Tournament, as no truly dominant teams have emerged from the league. Which four teams is still a wide-open issue, as the top-six teams in the conference standings are all within two games' distance of each other.

To emerge from the pack and claim one of the likely four tourney bids, the Cats can take either of two paths. Option No. 1 is to play terrific basketball down the stretch and try to leapfrog to the upper half of the conference standings.

Option No. 2 is to hope to be one of the teams that gets hot in the Big 12 Tournament March 4-7, because the winner receives an automatic berth to the NCAA tournament. Asbury, however, has no intention of falling back on plan B.

"Every game is crucial to us unless we Press conferences for the K-State men's basketball team meet in the Legends Room in Bramlage Coliseum. Its name notwithstanding, the Legends Room scarcely features any basketball plaques or trophies. Few homages are visible to the basketball tradition, which has produced 22 NCAA Tournament appearances and 17 first-team All-Americans. The elegant room is defined instead by floor-to-ceiling windows along one wall, which give way to a view of Wagner Field below.

Such is life on the K-State campus. In all corners of the K-State athletic world, football is king. The arrival of Bill Snyder in Manhattan in 1989 heralded the rebirth of K-State football and coincided with the beginning of the decline of K-State basketball.

K-State's basketball record has declined steadily since the beginning of the decade, and attendance at Bramlage Coliseum has followed suit. The state-of-the-art, 13,500-seat arena is home to an inconsistent basketball team that has become a fixture in the bottom half of the Big 12 Conference standings and to the barely 9,000 fans per game who show up to watch

TRYING TO PACK THE STANDS

After hitting an all-time low for attendance in 1995-96, the men's basketball team has increased its attendance the last two seasons,* but those figures are still far below the attendance averages during the 1960s and 1970s when the team played at Ahearn Field House.

TODD STEWART/COLLEGE

Although some think that the program left some of its magic in Ahearn Field House when it relocated in 1988, others disagree.

"The stadium would be good to watch games in if it was packed full of purple like the football stadium," Scott Rosborough, sophomore in open-option, said.

Though the men's basketball team's overall record has remained respectable in recent years, its conference record is something else entirely. Under Coach Tom Asbury, the Wildcats have logged a dismal 23-46 record in Big 12 Conference play.

Further, the Cats have struggled mightily in some of the games to which fans' hearts are most closely connected — losing 14 consecutive games to the Jayhawks and not winning an NCAA Tournament game in more than 10 years.

Some say they believe the disparity between football and men's basketball lies not so much within the campus or within the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics as in the city of Manhattan itself. Some think the city is not able to sustain two highly successful sports programs simultaneously.

"With the height of football coming up, it seems that some people have to choose one or the other, rather than both, and the hype has been on football in the '90s," said Carol Adolph, K-State ticket office manager.

The men's basketball team's low visibility compared to the football team's is an issue as well.

Part of the reason for the visibility problem could be that the program has not had a single player in recent years to whom it could hitch its wagon. The days of Mitch Richmond, Steve Henson or Rolando Blackman are a graying memory for most of today's student body, and few new legends have emerged to replace them.

"You don't see a dominant player on the team, and that's what I think they're missing," Rosborough said. "With football, they had Bishop on offense and a lot of big-name players on defense."

"We've enjoyed getting some outstanding players in basketball, but we haven't gotten enough of them," said Ernie Barrett, director of the Intercollegiate Athletic Agency. "After (Jack) Hartman retired, we had some very good coaches, but they didn't get the job done in recruiting."

"I think it's just a matter of getting the right players."

Others said they thought the causes could be more straightforward.

"I don't think we're winning as much as we used to," Athletic Director Max Urlick said.

Whatever the cause or causes of men's basketball's slide into second-class citizenry, a need for a cure is evident.

Though not a savior, an NCAA Tournament berth would be a promising first step in any potential return to the glory days of Hartman or Cotton Fitzsimmons. It also would help the school to avoid its longest string of absences from the Big Dance since a 5-year drought that began in 1982.

"We're still alive," Urlick said. "We just need to develop that consistency and increase our intensity."

"I think it all comes down to a lot of hard work," Barrett said. "I've always felt that we could get this basketball program back, and I'm a very strong supporter of Coach Asbury to get it done."

Mitch Richmond played at K-State from 1986-88. He now plays with the NBA's Washington Wizards.

CRISIS

placing advertisements in local newspapers before she resigned in December.

She said she was getting a lot of interest from people who had read the ads.

"What shocks me was that we had really good response to the ads," Sjogren said.

She said she decided to quit because both of her assistants quit and she was faced with too many responsibilities.

"I resigned because I was doing the work of three people," she said.

Sjogren said she would go back to work for the center to try to help it survive if she could, but she's busy student teaching this semester.

The center takes calls from people in the community who are facing loneliness, depression, pregnancy, abuse, relationship problems, job problems and suicide, Franco said.

"We're there to listen to people and give them contacts for other places that can help," Franco said.

The center opened in 1967 as part of the Department of Family Studies and Human Services, Jurich said.

During the 1970s, the center had about 80 volunteers and was fielding 2,500 to 3,000 calls a year, Jurich said.

"We were a very strong organization," he said.

The center prefers to hire people with experience in psychology, sociology, family studies or social work, McClaskey said.

The center's advisory board is in the process of making assessments about the center's future so board members can meet with Student Governing Association to make some decisions about its funding.

"What we need to do is try to make some assessments in terms of the viability of the phone," Jurich said.

If there aren't enough callers or enough volunteers, the board will have to decide whether to keep the program running.

"We have to have a viable organization," Jurich said. "We can't go on limping."

Jurich and McClaskey said they will do whatever they can to keep the phones staffed.

The board plans to talk with Lafene Health Center to see if it can support the program along with Lafene's other counseling services.

"If it's possible for it to survive, we'll get it moving again," Jurich said.

The board will be deciding whether to submit a request to SGA for continued funding, Jurich said.

Sjogren said that even if the center only gets a few callers now and then, it doesn't mean the phone should close down.

"Those few people still need help," she said.

Until a decision can be made, callers in crisis might get an answering machine instead of an understanding listener on the line.

"We've been in existence for 32 years now," Jurich said. "Maybe we've just outlived our usefulness."

sexual orientation from the university non-discrimination policy.

Although Hawk and Hanger know Gingrich might address controversial issues, they said that is not their reason for asking her to speak.

"We're not bringing her here to stir up anything or excite in a negative way," Hanger said. "We want to broaden the thinking base of Manhattan. Our goal is to educate, enhance and stimulate people."

A university is an ideal place for a presentation like this, Hawk said.

"The college setting is a great place for these sort of events," she said. "Students are just really learning how the system works and how politics work. It's a good time to increase their cultural sensitivity."

Hawk said the focus for the presentation will be more than gay rights.

"Our intention in bringing her here is clearly human rights," Hawk said. "Crime and lack of rights for one group should be a concern for everyone, not just that one group."

Hanger said she expects leaders from K-State and Manhattan to attend.

"I expect to see some professors there. I expect to see the provost there. I expect to see President Jon Wefald there," Hanger said. "Change comes from the top. We expect Jon Wefald to know that human rights issues are everyone's issues."

The speech is free and open to the public.

SPEECH

said. "The civil-rights movement would sort of be like, Martin Luther King, Malcolm X, sit-ins, then it sort of disappears and everything's OK."

Her dissatisfaction with public schools also carried over into higher education.

"Why does it cost $30,000 to go to Harvard?" she asked. "Why can't it all be free? Why didn't anybody think of that? Then we wouldn't have this argument about affirmative action."

"What kind of society makes people pay for education? One that believes in a class system," she said, answering her own question.

Brandon Clark, president of Black Student Union, said he was impressed with Brown's speech.

"I like how she went down the line in terms of history," he said. "I think she was a really good speaker, because she talked about why it is important to have a Black History Month."

The speech was sponsored by Black Student Union, in addition to the Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development and the Multicultural Student Organizations Office.

verdict would not alter their tactics.

The plaintiffs said their next step is to get an injunction shutting the Web site down.

Legal experts said the verdict is on shaky ground because U.S. District Judge Robert E. Jones used a lesser standard than the Supreme Court, which said threats must be likely to cause "imminent lawless action." Jones told the jury that the posters and Web site should be considered threats if they can be taken as such by a "reasonable person."

Herman Schwartz, a First Amendment expert at American University in Washington, D.C., said the verdict goes too far.

"We haven't really reached the stage in free speech that merely saying things without the likelihood that they'll be acted on soon amounts to a threat, a real threat," he said.

"The anti-abortion people have been saying these kinds of things for years. This talk that they're murderers, that they're mass murderers even, is protected speech. We're very solicitous of speech, even the speech we hate."

want to start thinking the only way we're going to get anywhere is through the league tournament," Asbury said. "I don't choose to do that. We're certainly not in that stage yet."

"We're not dealing with any magical number, but I'll say this — if we have 20, 21 [wins] going into the Big 12 Tournament, we'll be in great shape," he said.

To hit that mark, the Cats will have to do no less than win all of their remaining regular-season games, four of which are on the road, where the Wildcats have not yet won a conference game.

Sound impossible? "I tell you what, we could win every game," Asbury said. "Where we are, we could win out."

Indeed, the schedule works decidedly in the Wildcats' favor down the stretch. The Cats mostly finished taking their lumps from the conference leaders in January. With the games against the likes of Missouri, Oklahoma, and Oklahoma State out of the way, the February schedule features teams a bit more on par with K-State — the combined conference record for K-State's February opponents is 20-29.

Before they can top anyone, particularly on the road, the Wildcats will have to raise the intensity level a notch, Asbury said.

"Every single game had better energize us greatly right now," he said. "We'd better start playing every single game like it's our last."

"We've dug ourselves a hole, and now we've got to get ourselves out of it," freshman forward Travis Reynolds said.

"Every game we have to play with a lot of intensity and knock down our shots, and we'll be OK," he said.

Do-or-die time begins Saturday in Ames, Iowa, where K-State will look to leapfrog the Cyclones, who sit half a game ahead of them in the Big 12 standings with a 3-4 record in league play. The game could be a stumbling block for the Cats, as they are 1-7 at Hilton Coliseum in the '90s.

Following that are games against 2-5 Texas A & M and 0-7 Baylor, before episode two of the Sunflower Showdown is played in Lawrence.

After that, two potential spoilers come to town: Iowa State, which has upset K-State twice in Manhattan in the Asbury era, and Nebraska, which is riding high in the conference at 5-2 and has beaten the Wildcats already this year in Lincoln.

For its final performance, K-State will have to avoid another road blunder in Boulder.

If it proves equal to that, and to every other test between now and March 1, K-State will have a legitimate shot at an NCAA tournament berth.

"To us, it's a matter of how many guys are going to come out and play pretty well," Asbury said. "That's where we've been pretty erratic, and I don't think we should be. I'll take the blame for that."

The players are confident in their ability to put the pieces together under pressure in this home stretch in a way they haven't been able to so far this season.

"I think we've got the best team since I've been here," Rhodes said. "We need to put together a good run of games, but I think we have the talent to do that."

Cole honored in conference

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State strength and conditioning coach Rod Cole was selected as a co-winner of the 1999 Strength and Conditioning Professional of the Year award for the Big 12 Conference.

Cole, who was selected along with Mike Clark of Texas A&M, is a two-time winner of the award. He first won it in 1997.

The award is given by the National Strength and Conditioning Association based in Colorado Springs, Colo. The association is in its eighth year. Trainers in the Big 12 Conference selected Cole and Clark as this year's winners.

Cole and the other conference winners across the nation will be up for the National Award, which will be announced June 25 in Kansas City, Mo.

Cole has been with the Cats' varsity athletic programs for six years. He first came to K-State as a strength and conditioning assistant coach in 1993, but quickly became the strength and conditioning head coach in the same year after the departure of Jerry Palmieri.

Cole, who works with 30,000 pounds of weights at Vanier Sports Complex, said his honor is shared by the entire training staff and varsity programs, because without their help it couldn't have happened.

"It's a tribute to my staff, athletes and coaches of all the varsity sports here at Kansas State," Cole said of the honor. "It's kind of funny how I get honored when the athletes do all the hard work here."

Cole's staff consists of five individuals who work the varsity programs.

Marty Lehman has worked for Cole for four years and works with men's basketball, men's and women's golf, tennis and some football duties. Scott Gadeken has been at K-State for three years and works with the women's basketball, volleyball and baseball teams.

Mark Oberkrom is a graduate student with three years of experience with Cole. He works with track and field and football, while assisting with other programs. Cole's two student assistants are

COLE

John Vanover and Brian Lehmann, who work with the women's crew team.

Upon receiving the award, Cole said he was thankful for being at K-State and being involved in the lives of the athletes and coaches with whom he works on a daily basis.

"I'm thankful I'm in a good situation," Cole said. "I'm thankful the Lord let me come to Kansas State. I'm thankful that I'm here and I'm in the lives of all the great athletes here."

"This is all for the athletes of K-State. I just make sure they're working smart and hard. I just supervise them," he said.

"The coaches have to get some credit too. They are very supportive of what we do to train their athletes to be successful," Cole said.

Staff to consider varsity sports

By SETH TROTTER AND FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Soccer is considered the world's most popular sport, but at K-State, it doesn't gain much attention. That could change soon.

On Monday, an in-house committee made up of administrative staff for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics submitted a review of seven different sports under consideration for becoming the next varsity sport at K-State.

Besides soccer, the other sports being considered are bowling, equestrian, lacrosse, rifle, softball and swimming/diving.

Jim Epps, associate director of the Intercollegiate Athletic Agency, said that these sports may or may not become incorporated as varsity sports. For now, he said, they are just under review.

"We will convene a meeting and discuss the pros and cons of each sport," he said. "We will take a look at which one would best fit our circumstances and would have a natural blend within the area."

"Basically we will do a hard and fast feasibility analysis of each sport."

Epps said the review will explore several factors that affect a sport's chance for implementation.

"Analysis of those sports include potential impact, number of participants, facilities required, staffing patterns, competitive opportunities and start-up and operational costs," he said.

Besides these factors, Epps said, finances, level of interest, and Title IX regulations all play important roles in determining a sport's suitability for becoming a varsity sport.

Athletics Director Max Urlick said K-State can have only as many sports as resources will allow.

"If we can afford it we would have 40 sports," Urlick said. "We have a limited amount of resources, and we want to get the biggest return."

If K-State were to get varsity soccer, it would have to be a women's team because of Title IX rules. Because of Title IX, getting a varsity soccer team at K-State depends on the number of women who can participate.

"We need to increase our women's opportunities by 65 women," Urlick said.

In order to meet Title IX regulations, any new sport started at K-State is required to have 65 women participating.

Now, K-State is the only Big 12 school without a men's or women's varsity soccer team, but it does have both a men's and women's club soccer team.

a head above the rest

K-State center Olga Firsova fights for a rebound with Texas A&M forward Prissy Sharpe at Bramlage Coliseum. The Aggies defeated the Wildcats, 73-59.

Olga Firsova's height, enthusiasm add to success

The world is a difficult place to fit into, and when you tower over a majority of the population, it can be a lot harder to find a comfort zone.

But don't tell that to Olga Firsova. The 6-foot-6-inch center from the Ukraine has tackled life with a heart almost as big as her stature. In her first season at K-State, Firsova has turned this enthusiasm for life into a productive season for the Cats.

"I just enjoy playing," said Firsova, who played two seasons at Weatherford Junior College in Texas before transferring to K-State. "Life is not that long for us not to enjoy, so whatever I wind up doing, I'm enjoying it."

This enjoyment on and off the court has helped Firsova adjust quickly to head coach Deb Patterson's offensive and defensive scheme. Over the Cats' 11-8 start, Firsova is averaging 10 points per game and 5.9 rebounds.

Happy to have such a player in the lineup, Patterson nearly lost out on Firsova, who was recruited by five different schools after earning Second Team NJCAA All-America status in her sophomore year of junior college play.

However, Firsova opted to make the Manhattan transfer after seeing the unity and close relationships Patterson's team had with each other.

"I really like to have friends," she said. "The girls are really like family to me here, because I don't have anybody — relatives or my close friends — here."

The need for family was extremely important for Firsova, whose nuclear family resides halfway across the globe in Kiev. Learning basketball from her parents at an early age, Firsova said it was extremely difficult to leave behind the friends and family she had grown up with when she chose to enroll stateside.

"It was pretty scary for me, because it was the first time away from home, family, everybody," Firsova said. "I got homesick a lot."

Everything was different."

But, as Firsova quickly discovered, sometimes change is good. Outside of her close bond with the rest of the team, Firsova mentioned the small-town atmosphere of Manhattan as a positive. Quite opposite to the big-city bustle and hectic pace the 3 million people of Kiev provided, Firsova said the close proximity of the "Little Apple" grew on her once she settled in.

"At first, I didn't realize what it was going to be like. I just came," she said. "Everything is easier here. You don't have to take a bus or the subway. If you have a friend with a car, you get a ride."

Now more comfortable with her surroundings, Firsova has found a niche in the Cats' lineup as a commanding inside presence.

Besides scoring and rebounding, Firsova has made life miserable for opposing offenses. Through 19 games this season, Firsova has already recorded 29 blocks, only 12 shy of the season record set by Tina Dixon in 1983-84.

Something often overlooked is Firsova's shooting touch, a rarity for players her size. This touch has caught defenders off-guard at times, to which Firsova's two three-pointers on four attempts will attest.

Happy to contribute in any way possible, Firsova said the biggest rush comes from throwing one back on defense.

"Hitting a three-pointer, I don't get to do that very often," she said. "I just like blocking shots, and I'll do that every chance I get."

While the opportunity to alter shots has come more frequently for Firsova, she said Patterson has told her to fire one from downtown if the defense isn't paying attention.

"She said, 'If they don't respect you, shoot it,'" Firsova said. "Well, they didn't, and I shot it. It's not my shot. But if they'll leave me wide open, I'll shoot it."

Then, flashing a grin, Firsova added with a laugh, "I'll make them respect me."

No matter what recruiting publications say, this year's new Wildcats will rise to the occasion under Snyder

VIEWPOINT

JOEL WHITE

Remember back to 1996 when David Allen and Jarrod Cooper signed their letters of intent to play football for K-State.

Both were outstanding prospects for the Wildcats, but neither was a player the recruiting publications such as BlueChip Illustrated, SuperPrep, National Recruiting Advisor or PrepStar were drooling over.

SuperPrep rated Allen the 44th-best player in the Midlands Region. The same publication listed Cooper as the 60th-best player in the Southwest Region.

In 1998, Allen returned punts better than anyone in the nation. His NCAA record-tying four punt returns for touchdowns earned him First-Team All-America honors.

Cooper earned Second-Team All-America honors at strong safety, and gave nightmares to every Big 12 offensive coordinator along the way.

These guys weren't some of the best players in the region, they were among the best in the nation.

Today K-State will sign a new group of players, and as usual, the recruiting publications will say the class is a little above average. It won't even be on the bubble of the PrepStar's top-30 classes in the nation. That leads to some important questions.

Why are K-State's recruiting classes never in the top 30, but K-State's teams, at least for the last six seasons, are always in the top 20?

Are the recruiting services clueless, or do Bill Snyder and his staff work wonders with the team?

I don't know the answer to the first question, but I think I know the answer to the second question. Recruiting services are on the bordering of clueless, and Snyder and his staff do work wonders with the players he signs.

Snyder is to the point where he would not sign any players he doesn't think can play on the best team in the nation. Why should anyone doubt the players he signs?

I'm not saying Snyder signs the No. 1 player at every single position; in fact he almost never does. I'm saying he signs the players that can make the best team in the nation.

Let's face it, most of the nation's most sought-after recruits come from Texas, Florida and California. To the 18-year-old blue chippers living there, Manhattan is the middle of nowhere.

It's difficult, even for the best coach in the nation, to convince the most highly regarded players to leave their comfort zone and take a chance with the Manhattan Miracle. Many players Snyder lures to Manhattan are diamonds in the rough, and all of them have one thing in common — they're winners. *

What I can't figure out is why anyone puts any stock into the recruiting class rankings. The rankings are put together by journalists and recruiting "gurus" who watch as many high school players as humanly possible. Then they call other journalists, recruiting "gurus," high school coaches, players' parents and everyone else under the sun to compare notes.

There are several problems with this process.

One, the hundreds of Division I prospects across the nation make it impossible for the journalists and "gurus" to make a fair evaluation of any of them.

Two, if given the chance, every high school coach would make his player out to be a high school All-American. The third problem is most of the people who work in the recruiting services industry have never coached a single down of college football.

Whose talent evaluation would you trust more, that of a "guru," or that of Bill Snyder, the man who coached 28 All-Americans and 43 First-Team All-Big 8/Big 12 selections?

Snyder and his new staff will develop this year's recruiting class into a championship-caliber team, so don't be disappointed if you read it and it doesn't stack up to the nation's elite. The only thing that matters is what the players do when they arrive. My advice? Read a recruiting publication like it's a horoscope — it is strictly for entertainment.

Just trust Snyder like the young men who will sign on that dotted line today do. Allen and Cooper trusted Snyder, and look what they've gotten themselves into.

U.S. planes continue attacks against Iraq

■ Planes attack anti-ship missiles, radar after being fired upon by Iraq.

By ROBERT BURNS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — American warplanes on Tuesday broadened their response to Iraqi challenges of "no-fly" zones by attacking an anti-ship missile battery in southern Iraq after coming under fire from anti-aircraft artillery, U.S. officials said.

It was the first time in the recent string of almost daily confrontations in the skies over Iraq that U.S. planes have targeted shore-to-ship missile emplacements. They have routinely fired on radars, surface-to-air missile batteries, communications links and other elements of Iraq's air defense network.

There was no indication from U.S. officials that Iraq had fired any anti-ship missiles to provoke the attack. The incident indicated U.S. forces are no longer limiting their choice of targets to air defense sites.

Separately, U.S. officials reported five incidents Tuesday in northern Iraq where U.S. Air Force and Marine Corps planes attacked anti-aircraft artillery sites and a radar for a surface-to-air missile battery. The American planes acted after encountering anti-aircraft artillery fire, officials said.

In the incidents in northern and southern Iraq all U.S. planes returned safely to their bases, officials said.

In the incident in southern Iraq, two U.S. Navy F/A-18s and two Navy F-14s fired a total of four precision-guided bombs, known as GBU-12s, on a battery of CSSC-3 anti-ship missiles on the al-Faw peninsula that juts into the Persian Gulf at the mouth of the Shatt al-Arab waterway, officials said.

A senior defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said early indications were that the anti-ship missile site was hit — including radars used to guide the missiles — although details were not immediately available.

Earlier Tuesday in the northern "no-fly" zone, Air Force F-15Es dropped two precision-guided bombs on an anti-aircraft artillery battery after being targeted by Iraqi radar, the U.S. European Command announced from Incirlik Air Base, Turkey, where the U.S. planes are based.

Fifteen minutes later, another Iraqi radar targeted F-15Es, whose pilots responded by dropping more bombs. Damage to Iraqi forces is being assessed, the announcement said.

In a third incident in the north, a Marine Corps EA-6B electronic warfare plane fired a high-speed anti-radiation, or HARM, missile at an SA-2 missile radar site. About five minutes later, an unspecified number of F-15Es dropped GBU-12 precision-guided munitions on an anti-aircraft artillery site, the European Command said.

Ten minutes later, F-15Es dropped an unspecified number of GBU-12 munitions on another anti-aircraft artillery site deemed to pose a threat to U.S. and allied aircraft, European Command said.

U.S. planes have engaged in almost daily strikes on Iraqi radar and missile sites in recent weeks as Iraq increased activities apparently aimed at shooting down a U.S. plane. British aircraft occasionally have been involved in similar actions.

Defense Secretary William Cohen scoffed at a report Monday in an Iraqi newspaper that President Saddam Hussein has offered a reward of $14,000 for any Iraqi who shoots down an American plane.

"It reflects just another example of Saddam Hussein flailing out," Cohen said at a news conference.

Bond issue projects ongoing

■ Crumbling Classrooms money funds renovations, new construction.

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas legislature passed a bond issue worth $160 million in 1996, to be used for repairs, renovations and new additions in the six schools represented by the Kansas Board of Regents.

K-State received $32.4 million as a part of the bond issue to start the Crumbling Classrooms project, coordinated by David DeBusman, special projects coordinator for facility planning.

$20 million of the project money has already been spent with many projects complete, but several parts of the project are ongoing.

There are six main classifications for the Crumbling Classroom projects. All expenditures go toward American Disabilities Act accessibility, fire and safety, classrooms, repairs and renovations, large repairs and new construction for science and engineering additions.

Forty buildings on main campus, off-campus research centers, the Veterinary Medicine Center and K-State-Salina received improvements through more than 140 individual projects because of the bond.

$17.5 million was budgeted for improvements to main campus, not counting the new additions for science and engineering.

"We are pleased to accomplish a number of goals, especially the fact that we spread out the money to more buildings than we thought we could," DeBusman said. "Originally we were only going to make improvements in 13 buildings."

The money spent for each building varies from $2,000 for minor repairs to $1.5 million for large repairs to King Hall, he said.

Thompson Hall, which houses the Department of Geology, received several repairs.

Charles Oviatt, geology department head, said work on the building was desperately needed.

"The building is old and several areas needed remodeling," he said. "The classrooms had not been painted since the 1940s, the walls were crumbling in several rooms and there were no elevators or handicap accessibility to restrooms."

As part of the Crumbling Classrooms project, classrooms in Thompson received sheet rock and paint for the walls, new ceilings, new chairs and hardwood floors. The hallways were remodeled, and two restrooms and an elevator were installed, making the main floors in the building handicap accessible.

DeBusman said renovations to the large lecture room in the building will be done during this summer.

Another large part of the Crumbling Classrooms project is the $10.7 million budgeted for new additions to buildings for the science and engineering departments.

— DAVID DEBUSMAN, SPECIAL PROJECTS COORDINATOR FOR FACILITY PLANNING

Gerald Carter, director of facility planning, said construction is underway for Fiedler Hall, which is an addition to Durland Hall. Construction will last about 18 months.

Department of Civil Engineering head Stuart Swartz said the addition will create space so the department can move out of Seaton Hall.

"This is a major improvement for my department. With the new addition, we will have approximately the same amount of space, but the quality will be much better," he said.

"The new labs and classrooms will really benefit us," Swartz said.

After the new addition is made, two engineering departments will still be in Seaton, leaving room for still more additions in the future.

Carter said the science addition is still in the planning stages, but will most likely be made in the green space between Ackert and Military Science halls.

"We are in the process of designing it, and I would say we're about 30 percent finished with the documents needed to bid for contractors this summer," Carter said. "We'd like to start construction next fall."

DeBusman said he was satisfied with the accomplishments made because of the bond money, but more work needed to be done.

"We were pleased with the money received, but it was really only 25 percent of what we wanted to make the necessary improvements at K-State," DeBusman said.

"This makes me excited to do another bond issue," he said.

Another bond issue may be coming in the next few years, Susan Peterson, assistant to the president, said.

"There is conversation within the Board of Regents to propose another bond issue, but it is still in the early stages of discussion," Peterson said. "They are studying the situation to see if there's a need there. If there is another bond issue, it won't be up for a couple years at least."

Experience Culture in Film

Kaleidoscope Films Committee strives to educate, entertain

By DIANA LEE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Art movie fans need not look anywhere outside Manhattan to view their favorite films. In fact, thanks to the Union Program Council's Kaleidoscope Films Committee, which features art films on selected weekends, one doesn't even have to leave campus to view these films.

Chris Heeley, Kaleidoscope Films committee chairman, said the committee tries to introduce new ways of thinking and being to the campus itself and the community at large through the films it presents.

"Our biggest thing is about diversity," Heeley said. "It's hard to be exposed to different cultures, ideas and ways of thinking. When they go to Blockbuster Video people don't necessarily head to the foreign films section, but having events on campus allows people to come out and see these films at a small cost."

The committee concentrates on films that deviate from the mainstream for any number of reasons.

"Our guidelines go along independent films, foreign films, classical films and even into cult favorites or those that are starting to reach cult status," Heeley said.

The committee also brings in films it believes will help to diversify students' views of other cultures.

Lexi Thompson, Kaleidoscope committee member, said it is important to use the group as a tool to broaden people's horizons.

"It's very important that we bring in films that can bring different views of culture to this area," Thompson said. "Without something like this, most of us would have no other chance to experience it."

Misty Kelley, a UPC Program Adviser, said K-State students and faculty may otherwise miss out on seeing films that never make it to Manhattan theaters.

"A lot of films never make it to Manhattan that are really good and very highly acclaimed," Kelley said. "Kaleidoscope gives the community as a whole and K-State the chance to have a broader range of experiences."

Heeley said the committee selects the films it will show at the end of every year. Each member nominates a film and describes why it is worthy of being shown. Heeley said, however, that any input or suggestions from viewers is appreciated.

"If they just call the UPC office or come by and let us know, I can usually personally write something up about the film and submit it for consideration in the voting myself," Heeley said.

Committee members also are responsible for some of the day-to-day activities associated with the promotion and production sides of their involvement.

"We make all of those colorful posters you see hanging everywhere to promote the films, we take the tickets at the showings and are responsible for getting the movies returned on time and things like that," Heeley said. "We're always looking for more people who are interested in becoming involved."

The Kaleidoscope Committee is supported by the UPC fund, which is allocated by the Union, and some of its funding also comes from the student privilege fee.

"Because of the money we receive, we can afford to only charge $1.75 for admission," Heeley said. "Depending on the film, it can run us upwards of $600 to bring it, which would be difficult to offset with admission proceeds alone, so the money comes in very handy."

This will be an especially busy month for the committee, Heeley said, with a French Film Festival being shown during the week of Feb. 22-25, in addition to its other showings during weekends.

Heeley said the committee encourages students to come check out the films since they help keep them running.

"We would really like to have more students coming to check out the films and take advantage of what their money does," Heeley said.

Students to present plays, free Lunchbag Theatre

By M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance will offer a wide variety of shows this semester that students are sure to enjoy, said Charlotte MacFarland, associate professor of theater.

"There will be lots of variety with the type of plays," MacFarland said. "The season features avant garde style to classics." The season kicks off with a trip to India in "A Perfect Ganesh," playing from Feb. 11-13 and 17-20 at Nichols Theatre.

Kate Anderson, associate professor and director of theater, said the play is both a comedy and a drama that deals with the reality of the world using optimism.

During the play, the actors will not use any real props, but there will be sound effects for all the props.

"The props present an acting challenge of creating reality out of nothing," Anderson said.

On March 2-4, students may take a trip on the "Showboat," which will be performed at McCain Auditorium. This production, a classic Rodgers and Hammerstein musical, features a guest artist, Andre Solomon-Glover, who was in the recent Broadway cast.

For those who love drama, classic American tragedy is the focus in Tennessee Williams' "A Streetcar Named Desire," showing April 15-17 and 21-24 in Nichols Theatre.

The story centers around Southern belle Blanche Dubois' need for illusion and magic in a world where harsh reality will tear her apart.

MacFarland, director of the play, said "Streetcar" presents a mixture of emotions. "It's very exciting, poetic, steamy and sexy," she said.

Other performances during the semester will be smaller and directed by graduate students. These plays include the Eastern European play, "Largo Desolato," which takes the stage from Feb. 25-27 in the Purple Masque Theatre.

"Largo Desolato," directed by Karl Rutherford, graduate student in theater, is the tale of a man who must stand up for what he believes in or be censured.

"The play deals with a lot of issues," Rutherford said. "It's really about a guy struggling to figure out who he is."

The Purple Masque Theatre also will present "Happy Trails," written by Joel Bicknell, graduate student in theater, from April 1-3. It is the story of a clown who is visited by his parents while performing in New York City.

Due to the pressure of his family, the clown resorts to dropping acid.

"The show highlights an indiscriminate love where a son wants to be loved and accepted by his parents," Bicknell said.

Those looking for free entertainment during lunch can watch the Lunchbag Theatre performances in the Purple Masque Theatre at 11:30 a.m. on selected Thursdays.

Lunchbag Theatre productions are performed and directed entirely by students. There will be 10 one-act productions this semester where students can bring their lunches and eat during the performance.

Low Shelton, head of the acting and directing program, said Lunchbag Theatre is a type of workshop where students can work with peers instead of faculty.

"It's more of a real world situation," Shelton said.

Artist's paintings represent variety of African cultures

By KELLY LYNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After traveling to Egypt, Kenya, Mali, Morocco, Nigeria, Senegal, the Ivory Coast and Cameroon between 1972 and 1992, artist Betty LaDuke has let her art reflect her various visits as a personal spiritual journey.

LaDuke expresses her spiritual journey through her paintings, prints and etchings in her exhibition "Africa: Between Myth and Reality," which is on display in the K-State Student Union art gallery through Feb. 19.

"Africa: Between Myth and Reality" consists of seven large paintings, 15 prints and 22 color etchings.

Paul Donovan, Union Program Council program adviser, said he thought the exhibit is one that can be enjoyed by the entire community.

"It's pretty exciting for the community because they're so large and very vibrant. We're really excited about it,"

Donovan said. "This is probably the largest pieces we've ever had."

LaDuke's artwork is characterized by its combinations of bright oranges and yellows, as well as her attention to detail, Donovan said.

"It's a very colorful, energetic exhibition, and I really like that. It's a very unique style," Donovan said.

LaDuke's work also extends a powerful message to the viewer.

A quote in the gallery reads, "African women, between myth and reality, dominated my imagery; as mothers bringing forth, sustaining, and nurturing all life forms; cultural guardians and healers; mythical goddesses; and sexual beings."

Diane Meraz, senior in music education, said she enjoyed the diversity captured in LaDuke's work.

"You can see the different cultures in her African paintings," Meraz said. "I like the difference in the large size paintings and her smaller ones. There's a difference in the coloristic style."

LaDuke teaches applied art classes and other courses, such as Art in the Third World and Women and Art, at Southern Oregon State College. She has produced more than 150 solo exhibitions of artwork concerning art and women, particularly exhibitions concerning women in Third World countries. LaDuke is the author of "Compañeras: Women, Art and Social Change in Latin America" and "Africa Through the Eyes of Women Artists."

LaDuke was awarded scholarships at Denver University, the Cleveland Institute of Art and the Instituto Allende in San Miguel, Mexico. She completed her bachelor's and master's degrees at a California State University in 1963.

The gallery is open Monday through Friday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Shadows appear near Manhattan

■ Flint Hills Job Corps students follow mentors in conjunction with holiday.

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tanya Earwood, 16, awaits all 911 calls full of suspense. A sign from the dispatcher and the police car is on the road.

Earwood was one of 50 Flint Hills Job Corps Center students who participated at the Groundhog Job Shadow Day in the Manhattan area.

The event enabled the 16- to 24-year-olds to shadow a workplace mentor during a normal work day.

They experienced what it meant to be a nurse, policeman or secretary.

Earwood observed how the 911-emergency-computer-system works at Riley County Police Department.

"This computer system shows where the call comes from and the nearest police-car can be reached," Sergeant Stanley Congwright said.

Six Job Corps students got their hands-on experience at the RCPD. Earwood helped Isaiah Lumpkin, 19, and Michael McKesson, 19, bake fish, peel potatoes and cook vegetables for the 24 jail inmates.

Other students joined the patrol officers and rode with them in the cars, but only a few minor accidents occurred.

"The Job Shadow Day provides them an up-close look at how they can apply their skills learned in school and how to put them into action in the workplace," said Rossann Glover, School to Careers Coordinator at the Job Corps.

The Job Corps offers vocational, educational and social-skills training. Students can choose between seven different occupations like business/clerical occupations, carpentry, culinary arts and others.

The Groundhog Job Shadow provides the opportunity to explore the options on the market.

"Many students join the Job Corps programs because they had problems with the traditional setting," said Dorothy B. Mitchell, center director of the Job Corps.

"We provide a more individual education."

The Boston Private Industry Council conducted the Groundhog Job Shadow Day for the first time as part of its School-to-Work effort in 1996.

Office, Junior Achievement and the American Society of Association Executives formed a coalition to implement the event nationally.

They reached their goal to bring more than 125,000 students in contact with their workplace mentors.

"This year, the coalition wants to match 500,000 students with employers nationwide," Mitchell said.

Many mentors said they appreciated the program.

"I wish I would have had this kind of opportunity to look over someone else's shoulder and learn what the workplace is all about," said Viola Bess, graphic designer at K-State's Continuing Education Academic. "I kind of fell into my first jobs."

Bess was shadowed by Krista Smock.

Smock experienced how to use a layout program and to take on different duties of the office.

"Job Corps helps the students get a skill they can use," Bess said.

"My participation in today's event feels like I can give something back to the community."

Groundhog forecasts early spring

According to legend, absence of shadow means spring is drawing near

By DAVID KINNEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PUNXSUTAWNEY, Pa. — Thousands of winter-weary people who waited through a rainy night were rewarded this morning: Groundhog Punxsutawney Phil didn't see his shadow.

That means, according to legend, that spring is just around the corner.

A cheer went up as members of the local Groundhog Day club made the announcement, shortly after dawn. If Phil had seen his shadow, it would have meant six more weeks of winter.

"We will feel winter's wrath, but spring is coming," said Bill Cooper, president of the Inner Circle, the club that stages the annual midwinter festival.

It was the same cheery news — if you believe in such things — in Lilburn, Ga., where Georgia's groundhog forecaster, Gen. Beauregard Lee, also failed to see his shadow.

Cloudy skies kept shadows away when the 9-year-old rodent came out of his small mansion at 7:34 a.m., said Ruth Letowsky, a spokesperson for the Yellow River Game Ranch, where Gen. Lee lives.

The Groundhog Day tradition is rooted in a German superstition that if an animal casts a shadow on Feb. 2 — the Christian holiday of Candlemas — bad weather is coming.

But in the 110 years since German farmers began the festival in Punxsutawney, the morning of Feb. 2 has evolved into an elaborate show of hoodwinkery.

In years past, members of the club voted the night before whether or not Phil would see his shadow, rain or shine. Despite overcast skies last year, the club announced that the shadow appeared. They set off fireworks to simulate a sunrise.

This year, club members insisted, they did not decide what Phil's decision would be until they actually approached his burrow.

An announcement this morning estimated the crowd at just 15,000. Bad weather and a Groundhog Day in the middle of the week kept attendance down, but the crowd was full of enthusiasm for Phil.

Mike Simmons made a four-hour trip from the town of Tunkhannock to be here.

Asked why, he said, "I have no idea. For the absurdity?"

"It's something unusual," offered his friend, Sandra Peoples of Scranton. "Something you can say you did once."

"And only once," added Simmons' wife, Jackie.

Student legislators, leaders sponsor education day to promote awareness

■ Students from Regents schools will use Feb. 16 to lobby for education.

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students will be invading the capitol for the third annual State Education Day on Tuesday, Feb. 16.

State Education Day is a day when representatives from each of the six Regents schools — K-State, University of Kansas, Emporia State University, Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University and Pittsburg State University — educate legislators on issues affecting their schools.

Student Senate Government Relations Chair Elizabeth Gregory said this year the schools will be focusing on three issues: faculty salaries, library funding and state financial aid.

During the State of the State address, Gov. Bill Graves proposed an average 4.7-percent increase for faculty salaries, but representatives from each school will be trying to persuade legislators for a 7-percent increase, Gregory said.

Graves also proposed that 0.5 percent of Other Operating Expenditures be used for library funding. On State Education Day, representatives will argue for 1 percent of OOE to be used for library funding.

Student Senate Chair Gabe Eckert said they will try to have students relate personal stories about how the shortage of library resources has affected them.

Although the library funding issue can't be solved in one year, Eckert said, talking to legislators about it was a step in the right direction.

"I'm confident the issue will be solved in the next few years," he said.

The last issue students will be talking to legislators about is increasing state financial aid. Gregory said they want a $2 million increase.

One million dollars of the aid would go to the comprehensive grant program, which includes financial need-based aid for public, private and community colleges, and state scholarships.

The other $1 million would go to state scholarship programs. To qualify for this money, students need to be State Scholars but also have financial need.

Right now both programs receive a total of $600,000, Gregory said.

Gregory said their goal is to get at least what Graves proposed.

"You always ask for more than what you get," she said.

"We're at the point where anything is better than nothing."

Gregory said the main priority is to get the money needed for these areas from a source other than students.

"We want this if the Legislature will fund it," Gregory said. "But we won't support faculty salaries or any other priority funding if it's done from student pockets."

Student Body President Tracey Mann said talking to legislators in person really helps bring attention to the issues.

"My job is to personalize it," he said. "Make them see it's not just numbers. Show them a face."

Mann said a couple of television stations will be at State Education Day along with The Topeka Capital-Journal's editorial board. He said this will give their issues a lot of press.

Along with State Education Day, Gregory said the six Regents schools are starting a letter-writing campaign to all the legislators.

"The goal is to get a letter to every legislator," she said.

Mann said students who want to write letters to legislators need to personalize the letter, state their support for library funding, faculty salaries and scholarships, express any concerns they might have and thank the legislator for the support.

Mann said the student body presidents from the Regents universities want to ensure that each member of the legislative leadership receives a letter by Feb. 20.

Students who are interested in attending State Education Day to talk to legislators need to attend an informational meeting on Feb. 9.

"We'd like as many people to go as possible, but we don't want to take anyone that's not informed," Gregory said.

Rebels will talk peace

By KATARINA KRATOVA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia — Ethnic Albanian rebels reluctantly agreed Tuesday to take part in weekend peace talks aimed at ending the bloody 11-month conflict in Kosovo — a decision that focused international pressure on the hard-line Yugoslav government.

Rebel participation had been thrown into doubt after spokesman Adem Demaci recommended against sending delegates.

However, the main Kosovo Liberation Army spokesman, Jakup Krasniqi, told reporters in central Kosovo that the KLA would name its delegates Wednesday.

"We have some objections to the proposed document, but we are certainly ready to go," Krasniqi said in comments welcomed by Clinton administration officials.

Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic has sent the matter over to the Serb Parliament, which meets Thursday, and resisted giving any signal on whether the Serbs will send delegates to the talks organized by the United States and five European countries.

The government has been opposed to any terms that would erode its control over Kosovo.

Both sides face the threat of NATO strikes if they haven't started talks by Saturday in Rambouillet, France, and reached a deal by Feb. 19 to end the conflict over Kosovo Albanians' demand for independence.

More moderate Kosovo Albanian political leaders have said they would attend, but the key negotiating parties to any settlement are President Milosevic's government and the KLA, the warring parties in the conflict over the demand for independence.

Krasniqi said the KLA wants to send four delegates as part of the ethnic Albanian negotiating team, expected to number about 15.

The proposed U.S. peace plan at the talks in France would give Kosovo greater autonomy for the first three years. Political parties would decide what happens after that.

Krasniqi said KLA representatives will demand that Kosovo become an international protectorate for three years while negotiators work out a final status for Kosovo.

They also want any decision on Kosovo's future to be put to a referendum by the people of Kosovo.

Ethnic Albanians are by far the majority among the 2 million people of Kosovo, and most want independence.

While deferring the question of participation in the talks, the Yugoslav government appealed to the U.N. Security Council to convene an urgent meeting on Kosovo to prevent what it called the "open and clear threat of aggression" posed by NATO's threatened military strikes.

The NATO threat "directly undermines the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the FRY (Federal Republic of Yugoslavia) and flagrantly violates the principles enshrined in the U.N. Charter," Yugoslav Foreign Minister Zivadin Jovanovic said in a letter to the council.

Federal grants help emergency shelter, crisis center

By PAM LEWIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Grants awarded by the Federal Victims of Crime Act will make operational costs and programs more affordable at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. and the Crisis Center.

The shelter received $16,000 and the Crisis Center, which serves Geary, Riley and surrounding counties, received $118,576.

"Our request was for that amount because we had a very high deficit," Executive Director of the Shelter Junell Norris said. "We did not know if we were going to be able to keep our doors open. That is the reason we got the award."

The Federal Victims of Crime Act Grant provides funding to public and non-profit organizations that respond to the emotional and physical needs of crime victims.

The two recipients differ in the type of services they provide. The shelter houses single men and women, children older than 18 and families. It is not limited to domestic violence and sexual assault victims.

Among the people the shelter helps are survivors of homicide, victims of criminal threat and muggings. The shelter houses 26 people, with an additional eight at the Sunflower Transition Living Facility. The shelter has no fees or predetermined length of stay, but the average time is 11 days.

"This will not change the services provided here. We are just getting additional funding for something we are already doing," Norris said.

The Crisis Center has a more specific goal than the shelter. It helps battered and sexually assaulted women and children. It provides shelter if necessary and has a 24-hour crisis hot line.

Judy Davis, Executive Director of the Crisis Center, said the center's focus on a certain group of victims made the request for a large amount easier to receive.

"Applying for federal assistance is a competitive process," said Davis. "We demonstrated a need for service, made the argument and the case, and the result was money."

The shelter will receive a $5,000 grant from the Gannett Foundation in addition to the federal grant.

This is the largest corporate contribution the shelter has received. It will be awarded at 7 p.m. Wednesday at the social service advisory board meeting, in the city commission meeting room at 1101 Poyntz Ave.

Higher ed plan meets opposition

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Higher Education Structure for Excellence took another step in the Kansas Legislature last week.

The plan that would create two governing bodies in an effort to unify higher education institutions in Kansas was submitted at an education committee meeting by the Governor's Task Force.

The plan calls for a board of trustees to be established to oversee the state's community colleges and vocational/technical institutions. The Board of Regents would continue to govern the six Regent universities, and a higher education coordinating council, made up of seven governor-appointed members, would be responsible for communications and coordination between all sectors of higher education.

Lt. Gov. Gary Sherrer, who chairs the task force, said no one at the education committee meeting addressed any flaws or problems with the proposal.

"I felt very good after the meeting because I didn't think anyone raised any issues to change my thinking about the proposal," Sherrer said. "I didn't see anyone raise a problem to show this couldn't work."

Contrary to Sherrer's comments, Sen. Janis Lee, D-Kensington, a member of the education committee, expressed concern about the new plan.

She said the plan does not address one major area — funding for both the Regent universities and community colleges.

"I'm not enthused about it," Lee said. "Unless something happens to breathe new life into this plan, I think it will be dead on arrival."

Local property tax supports community colleges with some state district money, while the Regent universities are state funded. Lee said she thinks it will need to address more funding aspects to attract legislative attention.

"I don't think it will make it through all of the system," she said.

Lee said there is a need for more coordination between Regent and community colleges, but she said she thought the plan just adds another level of bureaucracy.

Board of Regents Chairman Bill Docking said the Regents, who have not yet taken a stance on the plan, are also concerned about the way budgetary matters would be handled, with the creation of two new boards.

"I worry that they would become very costly," Docking said. "They might create problems down the road."

Sherrer said some past plans have tried to attract votes by offering an appealing finance plan.

"I'm not interested in a program that buys support," Sherrer said. "I'm interested in a program that merits support."

Sherrer said there also are no firm details or figures yet for financing the new council.

"We purposely kept finance out," Sherrer said.

House votes to eliminate food sales tax

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The first important tax relief vote of the year showed strong bipartisan support in the House for eliminating the state's sales tax on groceries.

Representatives voted 86-37 Wednesday to add a proposal to phase out the 4.9-percent tax over four years as an amendment to a Senate bill that would allow five counties to levy local sales taxes. Senators have not yet discussed plans to cut or eliminate the food sales tax.

The proposal would save consumers $84 million in the 12 months starting June 1. After the sales tax on food was eliminated on June 1, 2002, consumers would save about $230 million a year.

House members tentatively approved the bill on a voice vote. A final vote is scheduled for today, and passage would send the bill back to the Senate.

Most of the debate centered on whether House members should be considering a food sales tax proposal so early in the session. Republican leaders also expressed concerns that the local sales tax bill needs to become law quickly and should remain unamended.

But 39 of the House's 77 Republicans joined 47 of 48 Democrats in supporting the amendment, sponsored by Rep. Cliff Franklin, R-Merriam. House Democrats have made eliminating the sales tax on food their top priority.

Unless Republican leaders can persuade GOP representatives who voted for the amendment to change their minds or wait for another opportunity, the bill should pass.

House Democrats appeared unlikely to budge. Minority Leader Jim Garner, D-Coffeyville, issued a news release with the headline, "Kansas House Democrats deliver on pledge."

Under the plan, the sales tax on food would decrease from 4.9 percent to 3.3 percent on June 1.

SAFE cycling

Plan aims for more bicycles, safer sidewalks

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new bicycle program is being created to eliminate the conflict between pedestrian and bicycle traffic on campus.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, said there are two goals that have been established by the Bicycle Master Plan. One is to encourage students to abandon automobiles as a method of transportation. The other is to make campus safer for students on the sidewalks.

"We just don't have any more parking," Taussig said. "We need to encourage people to ride a bike or walk and then make sure it is safe for them."

Phil Anderson, instructor in the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance, said the problem of bicycle and pedestrian safety is one the university should address. More patrol officers, adequately marked paths and the encouragement of other modes of transportation are areas he said needed to be improved.

"We are using money to regulate cars that create pollution when we should be using cleaner, alternate sources," Anderson said. "Encouraging other forms of transportation will go a long way in easing the congestion on campus."

Taussig wants to encourage these goals by improving infrastructures such as bike routes, making parking and signs available, enforcing bike statutes and improving public relations to get the message out to the public. He is interested in revising the bicycle regulations manual, to make certain bicyclists know where they may ride.

Another aspect Taussig is trying to get across is the need to register bicycles on campus, which he said is important and also a requirement.

"If students do not register their bikes, they will not know the regulations and where to ride and not to ride," Taussig said. "It will also help police find their bike if it becomes stolen."

Oscar Ruiz, bicycle patrol officer, said registering bicycles is important because it helps to find them if they are stolen, and it also makes available a record of the bicycle. About 2,300 bicycles are registered, but he said many more are ridden daily.

"It is a privilege and an opportunity to bring bikes on campus, just like vehicle registration," Ruiz said. "It is a way to keep track of how many bikes there are."

Taussig said the plan that is being constructed now is modeled after one used at Cornell University. In this plan, three different-colored diamonds are painted on paths specifying pedestrian only, bicycle only or a multi-use path.

JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A pedestrian walks past the bicycle racks in front of Seaton Hall Tuesday afternoon. Officials wish to improve infrastructures such as bike routes, making parking and signs available and enforcing bike statutes to help remedy bicycle-pedestrian relations.

Once the idea is reviewed by the Campus Development and Land Advisory committees, a test area around the library will be constructed sometime during spring break.

"There is no national standard or textbook-perfect solution," Taussig said. "This plan offers the best option for the campus to solve the pedestrian/bicycle problem."

John Lambert, director of public safety, said most of the accidents that happen now are the result of bicycles coming up from behind pedestrians and surprising them. He said everybody needs to be more aware and look where they are going.

"When classes are getting out, bicycles need to dismount on the major walkways," Lambert said. "Pedestrians need to also be more aware of where they are walking."

Taussig said the most important thing is to make students and faculty aware of the regulations that exist. A World Wide Web page is being worked on, and the possibility to register bicycles on the Internet might be available in the future.

"Every semester, a new batch of students comes in and we tend to forget that," Taussig said. "We need to get the safety and regulation information out every semester."

Dismount zones are in effect during the week from 7:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. except during school breaks. Some of the rules for bicyclists include yielding to pedestrians on main walkways.

Bicyclists also must obey all vehicular rules. For more information on regulations or registering a bicycle, contact Parking Services at 532-PARK.

Hackers learn e-mail passwords

■ About 400 e-mail break-ins were reported from Nov. 1 to Dec. 19.

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many students and faculty became paranoid last semester after a significant increase of e-mail break-ins.

About 400 break-ins were reported from the beginning of November until Dec. 19. During that time, 20 to 30 were reported each day.

"This is a dramatic increase," said Harvard Townsend, director of Computing and Network Services. "Everyone definitely needs to pay attention for the security of their account."

K-State has been subjected to security attacks for as long as e-mail has been available on campus.

Recently, the break-ins have been frequent and the damage severe.

A K-State employee's World Wide Web pages were tampered with to display pornography.

Three other Web pages belonging to a tenured professor, a dean and a department administrator were broken into and covered with vulgarity.

The most extensive damage was done to a graduate student's master's thesis when the account was broken into and all of the student's research was erased.

But after the accounts were closed and the passwords changed, CNS was able to restore all damages done to those accounts from a backup system.

The hackers are breaking into e-mail accounts using a program to steal passwords.

Hackers feed it possible passwords, and the program runs tests to try to crack the password. Once passwords are determined, hackers pass them around on their Web sites and chat rooms.

"It's not hard to do," Townsend said. The program can be found on the Internet.

"It's gotten easier and easier for people to get information and tools on how to break in," Townsend said. "And the tools have gotten more sophisticated and easier to run."

In most cases, hackers break into K-State users' accounts for use as a launching point, then use those account logins to hide their tracks so they won't later be traced breaking into other systems and accounts.

Break-ins rarely originate on campus. To combat the problem, CNS ran the same program against its password database to identify easy passwords and determine the vulnerable accounts.

People with vulnerable accounts were notified immediately to change their passwords. Close to 2,000 accounts had poor passwords, Townsend said.

Previous research by CNS indicated 20 percent of the K-State accounts were susceptible.

"The hackers are targeting easy passwords," said Jason Lacey, the chief of staff to Tracey Mann and Andy Macklin and a student representative of the Information Resource Management Council. "Make sure your passwords are original."

Accounts also can be entered illegally through security access holes and passwords that aren't encrypted.

To prevent account break-ins, K-State users should change their password often and not reveal the password to anyone.

Revealing passwords is a violation of K-State's Information Technology Policy. They also should not

U.N. orders American, British workers out of Iraq for safety

By EDITH M. LEDERER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The United Nations ordered its American and British employees out of Iraq on Wednesday after Baghdad refused to guarantee the safety of all U.N. workers from those countries, officials said.

U.N. security chief Benon Sevan issued the order after the government of President Saddam Hussein said it could vouch for the safety of only three American U.N. workers.

U.N. spokesman Fred Eckhard said the Iraqis guaranteed the safety of American U.N. employees Darlene Bisson, deputy director of the World Food Program, and the secretary to Prakash Shah, Secretary-General Kofi Annan's special representative to Iraq. Her name was not released.

The third American was Abdoullah Odeh, the head of the U.N. Development Program, U.N. officials said.

Hans von Sponeck, the U.N. humanitarian coordinator in Baghdad, told Associated Press Television News on Wednesday that there were no American or British workers left in Iraq. He said the last ones left Tuesday.

Before the United States and Britain launched airstrikes on Iraq in mid-December, there were 12 to 15 American and British nationals among the 400 U.N. employees in Iraq. In December, many U.N. employees went on vacation and the Americans and Britons "were advised not to return," Eckhard said.

The 130 members of the U.N. Special Commission charged with disarming Iraq — including 15 to 20 Americans and Britons — pulled out Dec. 16. Iraq has banned the commission's weapons inspectors from returning.

In Washington, D.C., State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said the reason for the order was a lack of security guarantees — and "not some new problem."

White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said the evacuation wasn't linked to any impending attack on Iraq.

The Iraqi government first raised the security issue in a letter Jan. 4, about two weeks after the airstrikes.

The following day, the U.N. Office of Legal Affairs sent a reply "reminding the government of its responsibilities to ensure the safety and security of all United Nations personnel in Iraq," Eckhard said.

But "it was clear that the govern-

K-State sports, Fort Riley bolster Manhattan revenue

A strong local economy and a good K-State football program are the two primary factors that contributed to a good 1998 for Manhattan, City Finance Director Curt Wood said.

The Manhattan sales tax receipts for 1998 were $573,000, more than the estimated budget for the year, Wood said. Tony Malleon, manager of Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbeque, said he's seen more business over the past year.

"We've definitely seen an increase in traffic through our doors," Malleon said. Jon Levin, owner and general manager of Varney's Book Store also reported an increase in sales.

The money from sales tax receipts goes to different places. The Economic Development Opportunity Fund receives 0.5 percent, the city general fund receives 0.5 percent and another 0.5 percent goes to the sales tax transfer fund that is transferred to the various tax-reported funds to reduce the mill levy in those funds.

The economy of Manhattan is stable, mainly due to K-State and Fort Riley, Wood said.

During times of economic downturn, Manhattan doesn't experience much of the effect. Yet, when the economy is booming, Manhattan doesn't experience the growth seen in other communities that rely more on the private sector.

Another factor for the increased returns was that the city was under the estimated budget in 1997 because it hadn't received all the December 1997 payments from the state of Kansas, Wood said. The money was collected during January 1998, which contributed to the increase.

The increase might also be due to the way the state collects revenue, Wood said. "If a big retailer is late on payments, then you wait a month to get the money. It also depends on how able the state is to process the payments."

Company might put plant in Hutchinson, not Manhattan

HUTCHINSON — Reports surfaced Wednesday that a medical products company reportedly looking into building a large facility in Manhattan, chose instead to build the plant in Hutchinson for undisclosed reasons.

Hutchinson Chamber of Commerce President Jon Daveline said STERIS, which markets a range of medical products including a sterilization system, has committed to the expansion project, though no deal had been signed. The Hutchinson City Council agreed Tuesday to apply for a $500,000 federal grant to support the project.

John Rawot, director of operations for STERIS at its Mentor, Ohio facility, said the report that STERIS was going to make a permanent home in Hutchinson was "pure speculation," and that the decision as to where the plant would be located had not yet been made.

"Many cities and areas are reviewed at many different times, but that doesn't mean that we will build a plant there," he said. "No decision has been made on putting a plant in either of those cities."

Ann Harts, director of economic development at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said the deal with STERIS is not definite yet.

"From what we heard from Hutchinson, they're in negotiations," she said.

STERIS had been reviewing Manhattan as a possible site for the new plant. The Manhattan City Commission voted Jan. 19 to extend money from the Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund to Project Mentor. Local media outlets had linked STERIS to the Mentor codename because of its Ohio plant location.

Proposal would double tax credit for adoptive parents

Graves' plan to double the income tax credit for people adopting children should easily pass the Senate when it comes up for debate next week.

"Everything is in play. There is a lot of shifting sand," committee chairman David Adkins, R-Leawood, said.

Tuesday, the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee unanimously endorsed the adoption credit bill. Committee Chairwoman Audrey Langworthy said she doesn't expect much opposition.

"I think it'll pass easily. Who's going to vote no?" Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, said.

Likewise, Adkins said he expected the adoption credit bill would get a favorable reception in his committee.

The tax credit would increase from $1,250 to $2,500 for someone adopting a child and from $1,500 to $3,000 if the child adopted is considered a special needs child or is in Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services custody.

Russia beginning to worry about Y2K computer glitch

MOSCOW — While many countries have been working on the so-called Y2K millennium bug problem for years, Russia has been slower to address it.

Last month, U.S. Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre said there was some worry in Washington, D.C., about computer problems in Russia. "They don't seem to have the same level of urgency that we have had over it," he said.

Alexander Krupnov, chairman of the Central Telecommunications Commission and the leader of Russia's efforts to solve the Y2K problem, asked NATO and the U.S. Defense Department for help Wednesday.

"We're in a critical situation in several areas," including the Defense Ministry, Krupnov said.

Radar screens could go blank, and the bug could throw certain nuclear systems into a test pattern, which apparently is difficult to stop, making the computer system inaccessible.

"It's not that nuclear missiles are going to pop off out of silos," said Paul Beaver, an analyst with Jane's Information Group in London.

U.S. defense agencies want to place American officers in Russian nuclear control rooms and Russian officers in American control rooms to monitor the changeover, Beaver said.

The cost of tackling the problem is staggering, especially for Russia, overwhelmed by mounting debts. And weapons aren't the only danger.

"The nuclear plants won't be able to get accurate temperature information, and you could have another Chernobyl," Beaver said, referring to the world's worst nuclear accident, at a Soviet plant in 1986. "And that would not just affect Russia."

Policy excludes clause on sexual orientation

K-State will not follow ESU in removal of clause advised by regents lawyer

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Emporia State University President Kay Schallenkamp removed sexual orientation from the school's nondiscrimination statement in fall 1998, following the advice of a Kansas Board of Regents lawyer.

But K-State has no plans to follow suit.

Pat Bosco, dean of institutional advancement, said sexual orientation was a natural addition to K-State's nondiscrimination policy a number of years ago, and there are no plans to change the policy.

Schallenkamp's decision to remove the nondiscrimination statement disturbed students, faculty and community members.

Cora Hedstrom, director of university relations at ESU, said the addition of sexual orientation in the statement had never been encouraged and was removed to make university documents consistent.

"It had never been approved in the policy," she said. "It had been slipped in at one time."

Schallenkamp consulted Joseph Barron, Regents lawyer, and Emporia State's general counsel, after she found the inconsistencies.

Barron advised her to change the policy because the university is a state agency and the state does not include sexual orientation in its policy. He also said it is not a protected class at the federal level.

"I didn't feel it was proper for them to do what the legislature hasn't done," he said.

Barron said K-State and other state universities have counsel to advise them on their policies. But he said he would not advise Kansas universities to include sexual orientation in their policies.

K-State's current nondiscrimination policy is "...equal opportunity to qualified individuals regardless of their race, sex, national origin, religion, age, sexual orientation, or handicap and to promote the full realization of equal opportunity for minorities and women through a comprehensive affirmative action program."

The policy also includes equal opportunity to qualified handicapped, disabled veterans and Vietnam veterans.

Bosco said if a student or faculty member is discriminated against because of their sexual orientation, they can file a written complaint with the affirmative action or dean of student life offices.

He said the procedures for the process are in the student handbook.

The University of Kansas and Pittsburg State University also include sexual orientation in their nondiscrimination policies.

Despite ESU's removal of sexual orientation, it has created a statement affirming the university's stance on discrimination to include with its nondiscrimination statement. A values statement also has been created to explain ESU's philosophies about issues ranging from diversity to academic policies.

Hedstrom said three open forums will be held at ESU to discuss the values statement that will eventually be presented in a brochure format to incoming students and faculty.

"We want to get input about what the campus thinks," Hedstrom said. "It might be modified if people feel strongly about something."

Leslie Lewis, director of ethnic/gender studies at ESU and a values task force member, said sexual orientation will be included in the companion statement.

"It's really important, particularly on university campuses, that we believe in equality for all people and approach it in a fair-minded way," she said.

The statement has been presented to legal counsel and Schallenkamp, and must be approved by Faculty Senate, Classified Assembly and Associated Student Government.

Anecea Stambaugh, sophomore in rehabilitation at ESU and member of the values task force, said if the statement is accepted it would make a powerful statement about student and faculty agreement.

"I think it's going to give the university a more positive feeling," she said.

Foundation continues $50 million campaign

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The KSU Foundation is more than halfway to its $50 million goal to support its scholarship drive.

The Foundation's drive kicked off Sept. 18, 1998 and has raised more than $33 million so far.

Gifts come from alumni, corporations and foundations.

Donors give gifts of money, real estate, stock, life insurance or some planned gifts, such as making arrangements in their will, gift annuities or charitable trusts.

The campaign includes nine colleges and some multicultural and international scholarships.

The scholarship drive has created 400 new scholarships and has added to the current scholarship funds, Kirk Baughan, Director of Special Campaigns for the Foundation, said.

"The funds have made new scholarships that range from all different curriculums and different grade levels," Baughan said.

Although some contributors want their money directed toward a specific college or certain circumstance, they are encouraged to make their gifts as general as possible, Baughan said.

"Sometimes donors have special interests, but we would like to see scholarships that more than just one group of people can apply for," Baughan said.

"The contributor is in the driver's seat though and the bottom line is we're glad the money is here at K-State," he said.

The $1 million dollar gift for Hale Library came from the scholarship drive. Money raised from KSU Foundation Telefund will also contribute to the total.

Trish Oakley, Director of Communications for the Foundation, said K-State's scholarship base began late compared to nearby universities. The University of Kansas began its funds in the late 1800s, while K-State began in 1944.

Campaign efforts are being carried out by the Foundation fundraising staff, deans and student volunteers from each college and alumni who have remained active with K-State.

Many companies and corporations participate in the Matching Gifts Program, which has equaled a portion of the campaign's earnings, Oakley said. It will match any gift's value given to K-State by one of its employees.

The $1 million dollar gift for Hale Library came from the scholarship drive. Money raised from KSU Foundation Telefund will also contribute to the total.

Scholarship Drive efforts will end June 30, 2000.

"We have so many talented students at K-State," Oakley said.

"It's such a shame we haven't been able to give out more money in the past."

Higher ed plan only adds bureaucracy

It would be a mistake for legislators to pass the Higher Education Structure on Excellence plan. In addition to the Kansas Board of Regents, the proposal would create two new governing bodies, one of which would oversee the community colleges and vocational/technical institutions, the other of which would coordinate all sectors of higher education.

The flaw of the proposal is that it relies heavily on the boards working together to accomplish goals.

Restructuring higher education can not be based so heavily on philosophy. The proposal calls for the three governing bodies to work together and cooperate to make education in Kansas something glorious, but it is unlikely and unrealistic to expect that to happen. What is likely is that the three boards would add levels of bureaucracy, hurting boards such as the regents.

Because the bodies would all be autonomous under the proposal, they all would have to lobby the legislature for funds. Instead of a united front, the boards will undoubtedly bicker, disagree and perhaps even hurt higher education in Kansas.

Another concern that should be addressed up front is that of cost. The proposal deals only with structure and does not give any specifics about how the restructuring would be funded. Instead, legislators have been coming up with their own numbers, estimating the entire cost to be up to $100 million. Such a figure, of course, would require substantial amendments to the budget.

The proposal should not be based so heavily on compromise. Instead, it should be based on sacrifice for the betterment of higher education in Kansas. One board should be created to oversee all higher education, and that board should understand that universities are on an upper tier in terms of higher education, but that community colleges also play a vital role in Kansas.

Of course, that board essentially would mean the end of what is now the Board of Regents. But the board would also be able to trim the fat that is taking resources away from regent universities. The current proposal is unlikely to produce any such results.

The less bureaucracy and money that the legislature has to deal with, the better chance there is to actually see a change for the better in higher education.

The worst people who drive around pedestrian crossings on campus are students. If you look, the older people always stop for pedestrian crossings and student crossings down on campus. It's the students that are going 35 miles an hour and about run over them.

The reason the basketball team has lost its luster over the last 8 or 9 years is because Tom Asbury is the most apathetic coach in the Big 12. Can Coach Snyder coach basketball, too?

MERCY in SHEEP'S CLOTHING

Capital punishment ignores victims

He came, he saw and he got Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan to change his mind. So I read about Pope John Paul II. Mark my words: capital punishment might never be the same.

As the pope departed St. Louis, he left a lasting impression on the pro-capital-punishment state of Missouri, expressing the Vatican's opinion of mercy in the name of giving death row inmates a chance at rehabilitation. No one was more affected by his words of tenderness than Carnahan.

As the pope left St. Louis, he left the governor with a plea: is there anything you can do for the man who is to be executed in two weeks time? Carnahan had no other choice, he said, but to agree with the pope and show mercy.

So Carnahan changed Darrell Mease's execution sentence to life without parole. As the pope left St. Louis, he indirectly gave a man his life back.

Nine pages later, The Kansas City Star reported a similarly lucky break for a fellow criminal facing possible execution.

Out of quiet Clearfield, Pa., there came the story of a murder trial where one teenage girl was convicted of mercilessly killing another. In a strange juxtaposition of fate, the family of the victim didn't seek the death penalty. Is this act of mercy a function of the pope's influence again, or could the motive of the victim's family be more layered than this?

The singular truth is that this family did not want their daughter's murderer to be executed. Does this mean they did not love their daughter? Why do they not want justice served? Why are they shying away from what Missouri has accepted as just and right?

The answer is that the family wants only what is right in the end. This family, it seems to me, does not care for superficial meanings of the word "justice" and its ilk. They strive for what would, in the long run, do their daughter complete and firm justice.

In a simple world, there would be no eclipsed meaning of what an act of mercy or justice actually is. Unfortunately, meaning in this world is easily bifurcated. The victim's mother explained the rationale for her stance against the short and sweet death penalty. "In jail," she said, "she'll be with murderers and rapists. We thought the death penalty would be too easy for her."

I like to think the pope was right — that people who are capable of horrendous acts can learn how to be normal people again. The maliciousness involved in being a criminal, though, must be taken into consideration. Where does an act of evil come from?

Perhaps it is pure malice. There might be nothing more to people's motives than negative emotions, as much as there is dampness to the rain. Perhaps evil people are screwed up in the brain and need medication. Perhaps they are products of some wicked past, where there stew now only vague memories of unresolved pain, memories that build upon time and amplify beyond rational recognition until either death or ... or what? Or until they meet the pope? Until we invent a time machine? What does it take to rehabilitate the malicious element in people?

Yeah, well, the pope never said rehabilitation would be easy, he only said it's better than death. The pope's rosy picture of humanity is one where even the bad seeds of society are capable of compassion and learned empathy. This is the point where I think the pope is misinformed.

Rather, it would seem that the mother in Pennsylvania had the right idea. The death penalty is too good for some people. The bad seeds of society should have no recourse for their actions other than the long and slow suffering that this life can afford them. This position gives full weight to counter the evils and misanthropes of the world. Only by speaking their language can we teach them our ways.

Under the guise of pontification, the death penalty takes a rather draconian bias. The roots of a person are uncorrupt and their ways are re-learnable. The goal of resuscitation, not extermination, should be paramount.

In the face of the mother from Pennsylvania, one can see the clarity of experience with evil. Too often this face is rejected and avoided. It is not our problem, so its connection to our own lives is lost. In our vanity, there is no room for vicarious sympathy, no understanding of how bitter the fruit of Fortuna can taste. It is in the eyes of the victimized, where truth will lie.

I believe the pope meant well, but he is only the pope, not a mother whose daughter was killed. Instead, he is the pope, symbol of humanity in an inhumane world. While it is commendable for him to speak out in optimism — and likewise for Carnahan to beacon this hope — how can we turn away the face of a person who knows more pain than most can imagine? How can hope for the inhumane be our trump card for righteousness?

There are times in my life when I do not act honorably. I am at times ignorant and unrelenting. Traveling through even this murky bog of conceit, I have witnessed glimpses of the other side, and it is cast not out of preconceived notions of who people are, but accepting in the detail of the individual sufferer.

This is our failing: when we combine justice with mercy and forget the pain suffered. To achieve balance truly, there must be no unrequited pain in life, and our justice system should be held to this fact.

Here, we can see that the frail concept of rehabilitation works against understanding what the victim feels and what justice is. The Vatican's idea of rehabilitation works only to smother the victim's feelings and to move our society towards a false understanding of feeling and to support a system of hollow justice.

Sanctions against Iraq hurt innocent citizens, not Hussein's position of power

The American press loves its morality tales. And no better fable of good versus evil exists than the current conflict with Iraq. On one side, Saddam Hussein, the Butcher of Baghdad, the world's second Adolf Hitler, rattling a nuclear/biological saber and threatening all of the good, innocent people of the world. On the other side are the shining knights of the United States. Girded in their hi-tech armor, they sally forth on their airborne steeds to fight for truth, justice, and the American way.

If only reality were so simple. Hussein is a butcher; there is little question of that. What tends to be forgotten is that from 1979 until 1991, he was one of our butchers, his atrocities ignored in return for oil and his support against Iran. During this period of strong friendship between the United States and Iraq, the United States and Great Britain supplied Iraq with intelligence, technology and supplies for the construction and use of biological and chemical weapons, ostensibly to be used against the Iranians but also put to effective use against the Kurds in northern Iraq.

It was these American and British weapons that U.S. soldiers would later deal with in the Gulf War. Biological materials supplied to Iraq by the United States during the pre-Gulf War friendship have been among the tools of mass destruction destroyed by U.N. inspectors. Similarly, an Iraqi biological weapons facility uncovered in January 1989 was vigorously denied by the State Department. The State Department now includes this site on its list of Iraqi weapons facilities.

What further muddies the water is that, despite claims of official ignorance by the State Department, none of this has been kept particularly secret. Human rights groups, the United Nations and even the CIA have documented numerous chemical weapons attacks carried out by Iraq against Kurdish civilians before 1990. Despite official acknowledgement by then-Secretary of State George Shultz that the United States had evidence of Iraqi chemical attacks against the Kurds, no attempt was made to rein in our ally in the Middle East, and shipments of weapons material from American and British sources to Iraq continued until at least the end of 1989.

With the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, Iraq's status as favored friend changed. Its hard to tell what motivated Hussein to invade Kuwait. Likely Kuwait, with its small population and smaller military, looked like an easy plum. Given the lack of any opposition by the United States or Great Britain to Hussein's other atrocities, it is probable that the Iraqi leader felt his western allies would not object.

Once Hussein realized his mistake, he made numerous attempts to appease his western benefactors. Iraq offered to withdraw from Kuwait beginning in August 1990 and continued to make withdrawal offers until just days before the bombing began in January of 1991. Rather than considering these offers, the National Security Council flatly refused all diplomatic solutions, pursuing a policy guaranteed to end in aggression.

The official U.S. stance towards Iraq has been to encourage the Iraqi people to depose Hussein and replace him with a democratically selected leader. The reality of U.S. policy has been just the opposite. Iraqi democratic opposition parties have been excluded from any consideration by the U.S. State Department since the beginning of the Gulf War. They have been prevented from any participation in discussion on U.N. policy toward Iraq.

Kurd, Shiite and Iraqi insurgents who rose up after the Gulf War were abandoned by the United States and left to the tender mercies of a frustrated and vengeful Iraqi army. It was only after public outcry over the March 1991 brutal massacre of Shiite Muslims in southern Iraq that the United States imposed a very limited protection to the Kurds and instituted the two no-fly zones. Instead, U.S. policy has been one of encouraging a military dictatorship in Iraq willing to cooperate with U.S. interests. The U.S. ideal has been for a military coup to remove Hussein and replace him with a similarly iron-fisted dictator, thus restoring a form of stability to Iraq favorable to U.S. economic and political interests.

The human toll of U.S. policy in Iraq has been tremendous and bloody. The destruction of civilian infrastructure during the Gulf War combined with punitive sanctions afterwards has resulted in a near-total collapse in water quality, disease prevention and medical care. According to a UNICEF report tabled in April 1998, mortality in Iraq had increased by 90,000 a year immediately after the Gulf War due to the effects of the sanctions, with 40,000 of those deaths occurring in children under the age of five.

Medical care, which had reached 97 percent of urban residents and 78 percent of the rural population, is now effectively nonexistent. Malnutrition, unknown in Iraq before the Gulf War, now affects over 1 million children under 5. Oil-for-food plans have been largely ineffective, while the United States and Great Britain have blocked or stalled importation of basic supplies, ostensibly under the fear that they might have military applications.

Yet despite the punitive sanctions, Hussein remains firmly in control. With no nuclear capability (as certified by the International Atomic Energy Agency), little chemical or biological capability remaining after eight years of weapons inspections, and a long record of only using such weapons against opponents incapable of retaliating, Hussein is far from the grave threat he is made out to be. The sanctions, rather than removing a dictator, have served only to punish the Iraqi population — for no better reason than for being born in Iraq.

How will we confront the cold-blooded farce that our little morality play has become? Will we rethink our policy against Hussein? Will we begin to support the democratic opposition to Hussein? Will we lift the sanctions imposed against the Iraqi people?

Or will we just go on with business as usual? After all, everyone loves a good story.

GOP proposes 'finding of wrongdoing'

■ Democrats angered by simple-majority measure that would determine guilt.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senate Democrats threatened on Wednesday to turn President Clinton's impeachment trial into a party battle if the Republicans go through with plans to vote on a declaration of wrongdoing before deciding the fate.

As House GOP prosecutors questioned the third of three witnesses in the case, Democratic leader Tom Daschle said his party's rank-and-file lawmakers were solidly opposed to any live trial testimony on the Senate floor. He also raised objections to the immediate public release of Monica Lewinsky's videotaped deposition.

What sparked the Democrats' sharpest criticism was a GOP proposal for a formal finding of wrongdoing, a measure that would require a simple majority for passage rather than the two-thirds needed for conviction on impeachment.

"If Republicans persist in demanding live witnesses and demanding more depositions, and demanding extra legal devices like findings of fact, the more it becomes a Republican trial," Daschle told reporters.

The White House also renewed its objections to the proposal, at the same time spokesman Joe Lockhart pledged a restrained response if — as expected — Clinton is acquitted on the two articles of impeachment.

"I now declare in a post-impeachment era, this is a gloat-free zone," he said.

Republican senators met privately late in the day and released a letter sent to the White House in which they asked Clinton to submit voluntarily to a sworn deposition to answer questions in the case.

"Your knowledge, intent, actions and omissions are central to the charges. ... Personal answers from you should prove beneficial in our efforts to reconcile conflicting testimony," the Republicans wrote in a request the White House rejected before the letter was even dispatched.

John Czwartacki, a spokesman for Majority Leader Trent Lott, told reporters he expected a vote when the trial resumes today on a proposal to release the depositions of Lewinsky and two other witnesses, both in written transcripts and videotapes. He said they could remain under seal for a limited period of time.

For his part, the chief House prosecutor, Rep. Henry Hyde, said he wants approval for live testimony by Lewinsky, presidential friend Vernon Jordan and White House aide Sidney Blumenthal, the three witnesses who testified in private depositions this week. A scaled-back request also is possible, requesting live testimony by one or two witnesses or the showing of portions of the videotapes.

GOP Senate officials said it would be difficult to secure enough votes to prevail on a call for live testimony, particularly with public opinion in favor of a swift end to the proceedings.

The Democratic maneuvering came as Blumenthal was questioned in a heavily secured room in the Capitol.

A source familiar with the deposition, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Blumenthal repeated the testimony he had given a grand jury last year concerning a conversation he had had with Clinton about the president's relationship with Lewinsky. The president lied to him, Blumenthal said.

Jordan and Lewinsky submitted to depositions earlier in the week as prosecutors probed for information that could buttress their case against the president. White House lawyers also attended the depositions but gave no indication they heard any revelations that caused them alarm.

Clinton is accused of perjury and obstruction of justice for attempting to conceal his sexual relationship with Lewinsky.

Republicans have been working in recent days on a "finding of fact" that would declare formally that Clinton had "willfully provided false and misleading testimony" to Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's grand jury. The draft document also alleges the president engaged in a course of conduct designed to "alter, delay, impede, cover up and conceal the existence of evidence and testimony" in the sexual harassment lawsuit that Paula Jones filed against him.

The document does not allege he committed perjury or obstructed justice, but Democrats attacked it sharply during the day as an unconstitutional move designed to inflict damage on Clinton.

Several Democrats cited an argument advanced in a Washington Post op-ed article by Sen. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, who also argued forcefully at a closed-door caucus during the day.

Senators must answer two questions, Byrd wrote: whether the president is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors and, if so, whether he should be removed from office.

"To lift this burden from the shoulders of senators by offering them a way to convict the president without having to accept responsibility for removing him from office would, in effect, bastardize the impeachment process," he wrote.

In comments to reporters, Daschle said opposition to the plan would be aggressive. The strategy, he said, "will be of course to offer an array of amendments. And we will do that as long as it appears that a finding of fact resolution could pass."

Another Democrat, Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, suggested an amendment could be placed before the Senate to declare Starr guilty of prosecutorial conduct.

Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., added another objection. "I smell an ulterior motive here," he said. "Pass findings of fact by majority vote and ... it will be used by Ken Starr or another prosecutor in a subsequent criminal case."

Public release of the deposition videotapes could set off a fresh round of public fascination with the case, since the woman at the center of the scandal has not yet told her story in public.

"At this point, I think that it would be better left not released to the public," Daschle said. Asked whether House prosecutors should be permitted to air portions of the tapes during their closing arguments, he said, "Our view is that if you're going to air a deposition, you better air the whole thing."

KSDB talks about sex

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A part of the Generation-X pop culture is heading to the K-State campus as KSDB 91.9 FM plans to begin broadcasting a radio call-in show based on MTV's "Loveline."

Dr. Wendy Blank, director of the Women's Clinic at Lafene Health Center, will be the host of the new show, which will have topics ranging from condoms and sexually transmitted diseases to relationships and alcohol.

"I got the idea from MTV's 'Loveline' and wanted to do something like that," Blank said.

The show will begin airing Feb. 12 from 4 to 5 p.m. and will be broadcast each Friday.

Jeremy Claeys, program director for KSDB, said 3 to 4 p.m. is a prime time for a large listener base. He said this hopefully will lead right into the talk-show hour.

"Having a health professional on the air is something good for the campus and the community to talk about health issues," Claeys said.

"This will give students the opportunity to see and interact with a professional," he said.

Blank said the reason she is interested in doing this type of show is to help more of the student population on campus with some important issues.

"I only see a small percentage come into Lafene," Blank said. "This is a way to get accurate information and to hopefully change the habits of students to lessen STD's and unwanted pregnancies."

Blank said the tentative topic for the first show will be condoms. The radio show, which is still without a name, will have a regular format of discussion and questions from callers.

Claeys said a student co-host will be with Blank on the air and guests are also possible. The radio station will have some editorial control, but topics are almost endless and call-screening will be in effect.

"This is something that serves the public and the campus," Claeys said. "The issues are pertinent to college-age students, and there is a wide-variety to talk about so students can find answers to specific problems."

Blank said that by doing the radio program, she hopes information about health and other issues will reach more students and will be more accurate.

"There are a lot of myths and old-wives tales surrounding a lot of these topics that are not true," Blank said. "I want to try to get the right information to students."

Claeys said producing and broadcasting the show does not cost the station anything except the time put in by the volunteer staff. Claeys said the main purpose for the show and the station is to serve students.

"We are here more for the students," Claeys said.

"We need to keep that focus because that is what we are here for," he said.

Kosovo separatists demand independence

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DRAGOBILJE, Yugoslavia — Separatists in Kosovo demanded a guarantee Wednesday that a vote on independence for their province would be part of any peace accord with Serbia — a move that dimmed prospects for this weekend's peace talks in France.

The rebel Kosovo Liberation Army has accepted the U.S.-European summons to the talks. In Belgrade, the government gave its strongest signals yet Wednesday that Serbia — Yugoslavia's dominant republic — will join the negotiations.

Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic's Socialist party hinted at attendance, saying that Yugoslavia supported solving the Kosovo issue through political means.

Serbia's hard-line Parliament, under Milosevic's de facto control, will decide today whether to accept the summons to talks scheduled to start Saturday.

NATO is threatening to attack if the Serbs and ethnic Albanians don't start talking by Saturday and strike a deal by Feb. 19 to end 11 months of fighting.

The allies are pushing a peace deal providing for a three-year period of autonomy for Kosovo — where ethnic Albanians make up some 90 percent of the population — possibly followed by talks on the province's future.

Most of Kosovo's Albanians demand independence, a goal that the allies have opposed for fear of stirring up the Balkans' volatile ethnic mix.

Kosovo's moderate Albanian leader, Ibrahim Rugova, said that he would attend the talks.

European Union envoy Wolfgang Petritsch said after meeting Serb officials in Belgrade that the government was seriously considering attending.

U.S. envoy Christopher Hill, who also met Serb officials, was more cautious. "I will decline the honor of making a prediction. I will hope that they will participate," he said.

Serbia's state-run television allowed hours of air time Tuesday to a moderate, Deputy Premier Vuk Draskovic, who supports participation in the talks, indicating leaders could be preparing the public for a "yes" by parliament.

Even Draskovic said Serbia will never agree to allowing Kosovo to become either independent or a third republic within Yugoslavia, along with Serbia and Montenegro.

Draskovic also said the idea of ethnic Albanian police and courts in Kosovo was unacceptable.

A commander in the Kosovo Liberation Army said Wednesday his side was joining talks with little faith they would resolve the conflict.

Independence "will come with war and not talks," said commander Remi, who like most top-ranking KLA officials identified himself only by one name, speaking in northern Kosovo. "The Serb side knows only force."

One KLA delegate said the rebels would "demand from the international community a guarantee that after a three-year period the Albanian people have the right to decide in a referendum on their freedom and independence.

"There we will go out with clear demands ... for freedom and democracy and independence for Kosovo," said Jakup Krasniqi, part of a five-member delegation to the Rambouillet talks.

The head of the Serb Orthodox Church, Patriarch Pavle, asked the French government Wednesday that the church be allowed to send observers to the talks.

The church, which has been critical of Milosevic's policies in Kosovo, has some 1,300 religious artifacts in the province and has repeatedly demanded a role in talks on Kosovo's future.

The 11-month-old fight for independence has killed 2,000 people in Kosovo and made refugees out of hundreds of thousands of ethnic Albanians.

Serb authorities on Wednesday moved to return the bodies of 29 of at least 40 people killed in an alleged massacre in the village of Racak. After performing autopsies, they brought the bodies in a truck to a town near Racak, but insisted relatives come to the police station to claim them.

Hundreds of villagers lined the streets of the town Wednesday as the vehicle drove to the police station. Fearing police harassment, the families refused to pick up the bodies, asking instead if a local Muslim religious leader could do it.

The Serbs refused, and the bodies were driven back to the capital of Kosovo.

Trackster jumps to high honors

■ High jumper begins final season as a Wildcat.

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior high jumper Charles Burney isn't your average track athlete. While many track and field athletes run and throw against competition, Burney soars over the competition.

With the ability to leap more than 7 feet in the air, Burney, a 1998 All-American, started off his already-successful career at K-State last season by posting such honors as a third-place finish in the Big 12 Track and Field Championships, a ninth-place finish at the NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships and a 15th-place finish at the NCAA Indoor Championships.

Before beginning outdoor competition later in the spring, Burney has the rest of his senior season in indoor track and field to look forward to, including critical meets such as the Big 12 Tournament on Feb. 19 and 20 and the NCAA Championships on March 5 and 6.

So far, Burney has started his last season for the Wildcats off right by setting a new meet record and grabbing first place at the K-State-Missouri triangular.

With Burney's success and contributions to the K-State track team, head coach Cliff Rovelto said he has jumped consistently at a high level.

"Charles Burney jumped at the same height in high jump, 7 feet 3-1/4," Rovelto said. "There's only a few guys in the country that have jumped higher than that and he's jumped that three times this year."

Burney, who began high jumping his senior year at Latexo High School in Crockett, Texas, said he had never considered high jumping until his basketball coaches recommended he put his jumping abilities to a different use. Even then he was reluctant to compete.

"Finally we got out to the district meet, they had signed me up to compete," Burney said. "I wasn't going to do it. I was going to hide behind the bleachers or something when they called my name."

"But my best friend was there, so when they called it, he pointed me out and I went ahead and jumped. And then I won it. Once I started winning, I liked it."

Burney competed in only four meets that season but went on to take first place in state competition. He continued jumping at Blinn Community College until it cancelled the track program. He then transferred to Kansas City Kansas Community College.

At KCKCC, Burney's abilities got him some attention, particularly from Rovelto. Burney holds the KCKCC high jump record. In 1995, he was the indoor national high jump champion, and in 1997 he became the NJCAA Region VI high jump champion and was a First-Team NJCAA All-American.

"Once I was there, I started talking to Coach Rovelto about K-State," Burney said. "K-State has a good high jump history."

Having jumped for a limited amount of time, Burney said a lot of his practice and preparation involves mental work as well as about 30 hours a week of physical preparation.

"I try to work on strength, technique and a lot of mental preparation since I haven't been doing it a long time," Burney said. "The second before you jump you have to think about so many different things."

"I used to try to think about everything, but now everything's starting to fall into place, so instead of trying to think of everything I just go with the flow."

Burney plans to continue to compete as a high jumper for as long as possible.

"I want to try to take it as far as I can," Burney said. "I feel like I've got a little potential beyond college."

Burney said in all of his events, he just wants to know he did the best he could.

"I'm hoping for the best, I should do my best, so all I'm thinking is positive things," Burney said. "I just want to try to go out and have fun, and if I end up in second or third place in a meet, I know I did my best and I had a good time, then I don't mind so much."

Team begins season with tourney, adjusts to spring without home field

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team kicks off its 1999 season Friday in a matchup with Pac 10 conference power Oregon State in The Showdown in the Desert tournament in Peoria, Ariz.

The Oregon State game kicks off what will be one of the Wildcat's toughest schedules in team history. In addition to playing in the powerhouse Big 12 Conference, K-State will play a combined seven away games against perennial top-20 teams in Alabama, Wichita State and Clemson.

First up, however, the Cats will have to face Oregon State, a team that finished second in the Pac 10 with an overall record of 35-14-1 last season. The matchup will take place at noon Friday, followed by a contest with the San Diego State Aztecs on Saturday and a rematch against the Beavers on Sunday.

"They were one of the top teams in the country last year," head coach Mike Clark said. "They definitely got snubbed by not playing in a regional last year."

"They have their top-three hitters back from last year and are very solid hitting from the left side," Clark said.

After finishing up in Arizona, the Cats will travel to Clemson, then return to Manhattan to play five straight games. Unfortunately, K-State doesn't have a true home field this season due to the delayed renovations to Frank Myers Field.

The Wildcats will be forced to play scheduled conference and non-conference games at several different venues, including Eisenhower Field in Manhattan, as well as fields in St. Joseph, Mo.; Salina; Hutchinson; and Wichita.

The disappointment of not having a home field was a significant one but was something the players and coaching staff have put behind them.

"Coach told us we wouldn't have the field when we got back from Christmas break," senior pitcher Brandon Peck said. "We were all disappointed, but we've gotten over it. We have all made it a dead issue."

"The players have accepted it," Clark said. "They're in the process of making shirts that say 'Road Rage Tour 1999' on them. This is a very mentally tough team."

In addition to having field woes, the Wildcats will begin the 1999 season without two of the team's better players: senior closer/right fielder Andy Silva and junior third baseman Travis Andre'.

Both starters were involved in an automobile accident that sent Silva to the hospital for surgery that will keep him sidelined for at least five weeks. Andre' is suspended indefinitely from the team.

The loss of both will create opportunities for younger players on this already inexperienced team, but the Wildcats still would rather have them back.

"Andy could have been our lead-off hitter," Peck said. "He's got a strong arm in the outfield, but we will be affected the most when we won't see him coming in to close."

Assistant coach Robbie Moen echoed those sentiments. "We'll miss him most in his closer role. He was pretty much automatic."

Seniors Tim Johnson and David Meares, both expected to be setup men, will try to fill Silva's role until his return.

Andre' most likely will be replaced by freshman Brett Reid, who surprised the coaching staff with his bat during fall practices.

Despite Reid stepping up for the Wildcats, Andre' will be missed.

"Travis brings a certain degree to this team that nobody else has," Moen said. "He has post-season experience when he played for Florida."

The probable starting lineup for the Oregon State game includes three true freshmen, two sophomores, two juniors and three seniors.

"This group has worked very hard," Clark said. "We have an experienced pitching staff, but we're young and inexperienced offensively."

Several of the younger team members have stepped up their intensity and work ethic during practice, and as a result will see significant playing time.

"Kyle Boyer has been a real surprise," Moen said. "We knew he had the potential to be a good

Tennis team battles illness, injury

■ Coach remains hopeful even with 0-5 record.

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State tennis team dropped two more matches last weekend in Oklahoma City; to Notre Dame on Saturday, 9-0, and to Tulsa on Sunday, 9-0.

K-State moved to 0-5 on the season after going into the meet shorthanded, with only five players making the trip to Oklahoma. Because of the drawbacks, the Cats were forced to forfeit several key matches.

Freshman Kathy Chuda, who has been out with the flu, and freshman Alena Jecminkova, who is nursing an injured ankle, did not play in Oklahoma.

Head coach Steve Bietau said he remains optimistic about the season.

"I am happy with the team," Bietau said. "It sounds crazy if you look at the record right now."

"I don't go into practice every day thinking that there is a big problem with our team. For the most part, the players who are healthy are on track with what they need to do," Bietau said.

Bietau said he felt it was hard to judge the team's progress against Notre Dame.

"I felt like their top four players were clearly better than us," he said.

Despite his feelings on his team's performance against Notre Dame, Bietau said he was pleased with the progress made against Tulsa.

"I think the Tulsa match was a much better indicator of where we are," Bietau said. "Overall, I'm not unhappy with the way they played."

After playing most of the 1998 season at no. 2 and no. 3 singles, Bietau said Martina Pospisilova continues to improve as K-State's no. 1 position singles player.

"Martina is trying to develop the kind of game that will win at number 1. This is a process that doesn't happen overnight," Bietau said. "You can go out and do a great job but maybe not look that good because of the competition."

Bietau said sophomores Anna Pampoulova and Natalia Farmer, who was also forced to play out of position due to injuries, had strong performances against Notre Dame and Tulsa.

"The match Anna played against Tulsa was one of the best I've seen her play since she's been here," he said. "Natalia is making some progress. She hasn't beaten people at the no. 4 position, and now is playing the no. 4 position and comes close to winning the match."

After a weekend off, the Wildcats will look to rebound from the loss when they battle Utah and Brigham Young University in Salt Lake City on Feb. 14 and 15.

Students slip into soap addiction

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Addiction can dominate a person's life, imposing itself, becoming the only real priority. Soap operas are no different. "I always have to run over to the Union in between classes and check out my soaps," Erica Bowden, junior in architectural engineering, said. "I can't miss anything this week — Ryan's in jail on 'All My Children.'"

Daytime television's offerings of soap operas, talk shows and sporting events can be a guilty pleasure for students with time to kill. When viewed in moderation, television can be a way to unwind. For some, however, TV shows can be demanding, commanding enough attention that people choose to skip classes for their dose.

"Last semester, my best friend always had to be home at noon for 'Days,' even if he had a class," Jacob Jansonius, senior in public relations, said. "He's a little better now, though, so he just has me tape it for him while he's at work."

Prime-time television can have the same effect. NBC's evening lineup can cause a person to manipulate his or her evening around a favorite show.

"One of my roommates needed a class for her major that was only offered on Thursday nights," Julie Vavra, junior in architectural engineering, said. "She decided to put it off for another semester so she wouldn't miss 'Friends' all the time."

Kelly Quester, counselor with Lafene Health Center Counseling Services, said the fascination with daytime television doesn't surprise her. She said the more soap opera viewers get involved with the program's characters, the more they feel a need to tune in.

"Soap operas are addictive, so you just get sucked in," Quester said. "They're so compelling. People get to know the characters and get involved with the storylines, since they never end."

"When some of the girls in my sorority are eating lunch, they'll ask our house mom to open up the doors to the TV room so they don't miss too much of 'Days of Our Lives,'" Vavra said.

Shellee Foltz, junior in animal science, watches "Days of Our Lives" Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Student Union. Foltz never misses the show and tapes it if she can't watch it.

Bowden said although she is a soap-opera buff, she doesn't let it interfere with her classes.

"I've been watching some soaps since junior high," Bowden said. "I like them, but I wouldn't skip class or anything because I wanted to see 'General Hospital.'"

Quester said while she thought a little television each day is OK, students should watch out for too much time in front of the set.

"Television is cutting people off and keeping them from developing social skills," she said. "You have to be careful about how much you watch."

But for a generation that practically grew up in front of the TV set, Quester said, it is perfectly normal to feel the urge to tune in for an hour or two each day. "It's all a part of human nature," she said. "Many of us were practically weaned on TV."

Mr. Blonde disbands

By JOEY ECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Mr. Blonde, a Manhattan groove-metal funk band, is calling it quits.

Fans of the band, however, can catch its last performance at 10 tonight at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

Drummer Tom Wolridge said the band is splitting up because of a job offer bass player Jake Goheen received out of state.

Mr. Blonde formed in December 1997 after local bands Backporch Mary, Peel and Red Eldin all broke up. Chris Henrie, guitar player for Mr. Blonde, used to be part of Backporch Mary, while Goheen played for Red Eldin and Wolridge was the drummer for Peel.

"We came from three different bands with three different styles," Wolridge said.

He said he felt this was why the band has such a different sound.

"We're kind of groove-metal," he said. "I wish there was a style we could categorize ourselves in, but there's not."

Band members said they will not quit performing music altogether after tonight.

Wolridge said he will be getting back together with Peel, and Henrie will play with El Fountain. Goheen's plans, he said, are still up in the air.

"I know he can't keep away from that bass too long," Wolridge said.

Performing tonight with Mr. Blonde will be Eight Degrees, another groove-metal funk band from Topeka, and the aggressive-rock Manhattan band The Egomaniacs. The Egomaniacs is made up of members formerly of Scully, El Fountain and Seraphine 7.

Steve Anthony, music promoter for Chance, said given the popularity of Mr. Blonde, he wanted this show to start a little earlier than usual.

"In the past, we've said shows will start around 10 or 10:30, and they never do, but this one really will start at 10 p.m.," Anthony said.

With the addition of Eight Degrees, the diversity of each of the bands should prove to be an entertaining evening, Wolridge said.

"It's going to be an interesting show, that's for sure," Wolridge said.

Hard rock, salsa don't make hot combination

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Some genres of music were meant to be mixed.

Take the blend of hip-hop and hardcore music, which produced bands such as Rage Against the Machine, the Deftones and Incubus.

Then there are styles that never should have been put in the musical blender. Enter PUYA.

On the band's MCA Records debut, "Fundamental," the Puerto Rico quartet's attempt to fuse hard rock with salsa music is an experiment that tests one's listening tolerance. The clash of musical styles that carries over the album's 12 tracks leaves a Menudo-meets-Metallica impression, probably not something the PR executives at MCA were aiming for.

The madness begins with "oasis," a track not to be mistaken as an ode to the British band of the same name. The song jumps from hardcore anthem to Latin rhythm to speed metal guitar solo before ending with a Spanish shout-out to "oasis, here is where the sound of the future is born." Hopefully this wasn't a self-reference, because the jading mix imprinted on "oasis" would make for a long 21st century.

Other artists attempt to mold a distinct sound out of their influences. On the flipside, PUYA decided to let each influence's style play a part in its music. This non-biased approach either brings in a diversified crowd like no other, or none at all. A chance to sample the turnout came Tuesday night, when PUYA opened for Fear Factory and System of a Down at the Bottleneck in Lawrence.

Before shelling out some green for these characters the next time they roll through the area, a thorough listen to "Fundamental" is recommended. The schizophrenic sound could leave anybody feeling a little insane after one session, but if you have the attention span of a caffeinated 5-year-old, PUYA is right up your alley.

One of the few highlights found on "Fundamental" is the sixth track, "retro." Finally discovering a blend of soft and hard that works, the track's melodic opening transitions into a brutal assault of lead singer Sergio Curbelo's lyrics fused with guitarist Ramón Ortiz Picó's pummeling chords. The focus on an intense style throughout "retro" produces a song kindred to Sepultura, another hardcore unit spawned south of the United States. Unfortunately, the album's highlights fade after this small peak. The other 11 tracks seem lost in a cloud of different styles.

PUYA applies trying to distance itself from other competing Latin rock bands.

PUYA has found an audience in the growing Latin rock scenes in Los Angeles and Miami, but the dozen doses of sound offered on "Fundamental" probably won't establish any new fan bases. Far from a household name, PUYA probably will remain relatively obscure until the band channels its influences into easier to digest tracks and establishes a style of its own.

Court volunteers give children representation

CASA offers assistance for children whose voices might be lost in system.

By ANNETTE SWEET
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Children can speak.

Everyday they live in an adult world listening to every word. They understand decisions are based on experience and are usually in their best interests. Children also form questions, no matter how rhetoric, that need to be answered.

"Kids have the right to be heard," Alfred Cochran, professor of music, said. "They can get caught up in the legal system with no one to represent them."

And that is what the Court Appointed Special Advocates project does.

For the past 11 years, CASA has been listening to children and making recommendations based on what volunteers see and hear from children. CASA works on a volunteer basis and, at this time, has only 18 volunteers.

CASA's main goal is to have the voices of children heard. Its role is critical to maintain an equilibrium between the parents and children.

"Our job is to sit down with the child and listen. By doing this we can assess what we think is in the best interest of the child. Legal representation is made for the parent, but then who listens to the child and what the child wants?" Nikki Groneweg, sophomore in psychology, said.

There are three kinds of cases CASA volunteers handle. Children who have been neglected, abused or have parents who are in the process of a divorce may be appointed a person involved with CASA.

"Judges make the decision whether or not a child needs to be represented by CASA," Jayme Morris-Hardeman, advocate supervisor, said.

"The case is reviewed, and then if necessary, a judge will ask that a CASA volunteer step in and represent the child."

The program for CASA involves 30 hours of extensive training and is divided into eight nights of problem solving, investigating and looking at different aspects of the court system. The non-profit organization requires an application, interviews and reference checks. A person who wants to volunteer has to invest time into the process.

"A volunteer must be over 18 years old and be willing to give a year to the program," Morris-Hardeman said. "Some cases last longer than others do."

The most important aspect of CASA is the welfare of the child. More than 100 children are helped per year.

The process, aside from meeting with the child, has volunteers talking with the parents or foster parents. A meeting is conducted on a weekly basis, and then assessments are made and given to the judge. "I work, go to school and still have time to devote to CASA. I feel I can make a difference in a child's life," Groneweg said. "I also like working and helping people, which gives me good working experience." Cochran said he was thankful to be helping someone in need and to be involved in a program that supports children's needs.

CASA is funded by grants, donations from the community and the United Way. The sorority Kappa Alpha Theta uses CASA as a philanthropy and raises money to support the program.

An orientation for volunteering will be at 7 Monday night in the Small Claims Court Room at the Riley County Courthouse.

The next training session will start March 1.

Anyone interested in getting involved, can call Morris-Hardeman at 537-6367.

Morris-Hardeman said many K-State students volunteer and it doesn't matter what field of study a student is in.

"Children should not be forgotten," Groneweg said.

False promises hide behind ideal vacations

Some agencies use credit card numbers to charge for unavailable trips

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is the beginning of the semester and already many students want spring break to arrive. Many are planning trips to Cancun, Padre Island or any number of other venues.

While making plans, students often deal with companies offering vacation packages. Although some of these companies might not be legitimate, there are ways to avoid getting scammed.

Joyce Woodard, president of the Better Business Bureau, said many ads entice students to call by offering trips to Miami or other places for $200. The students then have their credit cards charged before they even get off the phone, only to find out there are no trips during their scheduled spring break.

"Never give your credit card number over the phone," Woodard said.

"The offers are there, but the time might not match up to what your spring break is."

Andrew Chalfant, regional sales manager of USA Spring Break, said people should never give someone a credit card number if that is the first thing asked. Always get specific information first before booking a reservation for a trip.

Chalfant said students should ask for information such as if the company is a member of the American Society of Travel Agents, the Better Business Bureau or the International Agency Travel Agents Network.

"These are all respected organizations, and travel agencies are required to be members," Chalfant said. "They have rules and guidelines set for agencies to follow."

Chalfant said another important question to ask is if the company has an Escrow account established. The account is required for all international travel operations and protects consumers.

The money placed in the account can be removed only for payment of airfares and hotels.

Two months after the trip takes place is the first time a company can touch any remaining money.

This allows a safety net in case a trip doesn't happen so students can receive a refund.

"We are with the student every step of the way, from the preliminary information to having personnel at the destination," Chalfant said.

Zandra Axelton, manager of Creative Travel in Manhattan, said students should choose well-known companies when making travel arrangements because some of the lesser-known companies promise things such as meals or special packages that are not there.

"Try to find the best deal for the best package," Axelton said.

"Check all resources by calling around. Don't take the first thing you think is a fair price."

Axelton also gave a few tips for students to follow so they can avoid getting scammed.

It is important to talk to a travel agent and ask if the company is a part of any travel memberships call around to various agencies to see if it is legitimate and ask specific information before giving any credit card or bank account information.

"If somebody has never heard of a hotel they've been booked in, double-check by calling around or calling the hotel itself," Axelton said.

Chalfant said another way a student could check a company is by contacting the Department of Transportation. He said companies are required by law to be filed with the department in order to run charter services.

"As with buying anything, always research," Chalfant said. "If it sounds too good to be true, it probably is."

For more information on travel companies, contact the Better Business Bureau at (785) 232-0454.

EDUCATION

Looking for a way to better strengthen higher education is a separate issue from finance, he said. The new coordination council should have a budget of around $3 million, Sherrer said.

Although $3 million may sound like a lot of money, Sherrer said, the amount devoted toward better, more efficient education programs is a good deal.

"With a much higher level of coordination, cooperation and focus, it'll be a bargain," Sherrer said.

Docking said the Board of Regents would like to be able to look at some of the other plans that have been created for higher education restructuring. He said the board needs time to react to the other plans as well.

"The board wants to wait a bit before we make a decision," Docking said.

The board will have a formal meeting Feb. 17 and 18, Docking said. The plan will be discussed during the meeting, but Docking said he doesn't know if the board will make any decisions about it.

Sherrer said the task force is not sure when the bill will be drafted. The bill will start in the House of Representatives, and then could be passed on to the Senate.

SALES TAX

It would decrease to 2.2 percent on June 1, 2001, and would be eliminated a year later.

Republican Gov. Bill Graves has opposed eliminating the sales tax on food, saying he would prefer tax cuts that primarily target the poor. Last year, he successfully advocated increasing the rebate that poor Kansans receive for the sales tax they pay on food.

The cost to the state of eliminating the food sales tax also has created opposition.

"There are other tax cuts that are probably on the table, and this one essentially eats up all the available dollars and precludes considering anything else," said Sen. Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, chairwoman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee.

Senators must consider the House amendments. If they reject them — which is likely — legislative leaders would appoint a joint conference committee to negotiate a final version.

That would take time, something many senators want to avoid.

They want quick passage of the bill to allow Finney County to levy a sales tax of 0.5 percent to finance renovations at Garden City's municipal pool, the largest free pool in the world. Officials want to have a vote with municipal elections in April.

To have the vote in April, the bill must be signed into law by Feb. 12. Freshman Rep. Ward Loyd, R-Garden City, asked his colleagues to leave the bill unamended so final House action could send it to the governor.

Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, chairman of the House Taxation Committee, urged representatives to "do the right thing."

Most House members ignored the plea.

"The swimming pool's important, but so are the 2.5 million Kansans paying sales tax on food," Franklin said.

leave a computer unattended or forget to log off.

It's urgent that passwords be changed every six months, Lacey and Townsend said.

All faculty and staff were required to have passwords changed by Jan. 31.

Townsend is trying to establish a policy and procedure to require all students change their passwords by fall 1999.

Students living in residence halls are particularly vulnerable to break-ins.

All computers in the halls run on a shared network, which makes it easier to steal passwords.

Attacks on residence halls are usually run by a "password sniffer" that watches network traffic for anything that looks like it could be a password.

To prevent future break-ins, CNS continuously is monitoring the sources of information on security alerts and disables all accounts reported tampered with.

During winter break, CNS updated systems software to install security patches that would close any holes in the system.

"Educating everyone is the most efficient way to reduce future security incidents," Lacey said.

"The main thing is to inform faculty and students that it's a problem and it's out there," he said.

ment was not going to reverse its decision," Eckhard said. He said the government only would vouch for the safety of three Americans.

The Iraqis wanted Bisson, Shah's secretary, and Odeh to stay in Baghdad, U.N. officials said.

Sevan "did not accept that security considerations could be applied selectively," Eckhard said.

Sevan recommended to the secretary-general that all American and British nationals should leave the country as a matter of principle, and Annan agreed, Eckhard said.

The spokesman, speaking on customary terms of anonymity, said "it is absurd for the (Iraqi) government to claim it can't protect a few individuals."

Meanwhile, chief weapons inspector Richard Butler met Annan on Wednesday afternoon, amid speculation that he will not be part of the panel being established by the Security Council to assess Iraq's disarmament.

U.N. spokesman called it a regular meeting to discuss developments relevant to Iraq, but gave no further details.

CBS tops ratings list

By DAVID BAUDER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — By standard television measurements, "The Steve Harvey Show" isn't a hit. Last week it ranked 101st on the Nielsen Media Research list of 132 prime-time programs.

Among black audiences, though, the WB's Thursday night comedy is the most popular show on the air.

It's one example of how blacks and whites differ in what they watch. A new study, however, shows the races may be finding more common ground as networks do a better job putting together multiethnic casts.

During the last three months of 1998, six shows ranked among the 20 most-watched series in both black and white homes, according to the study by TN Media, an advertising buying firm. They were "ER," "60 Minutes," "Monday Night Football," "Touched By an Angel," "NYPD Blue" and "The CBS Sunday Movie."

Two years ago, the two races had only "Monday Night Football" in common as a favorite show. The three entertainment series on the recent list have multiethnic casts, which is becoming a more frequent practice, said Stacey Lynn, vice president of broadcast research at TN Media.

Younger networks that tried to establish themselves by appealing to a black audience — Fox, the WB and UPN — have recently broadened their appeal, she said.

CBS is now the top-rated network among both blacks and whites after several years in which Fox had the largest claim on the black audience, the study said. CBS's ratings are remarkably similar for both races.

That may be because CBS's shows appeal to an older audience and many of the black-oriented programs on other networks are aimed at young people, Lynn said.

"At some point there is a lot of common ground and age is one of those things," she said.

The WB and UPN still have significantly higher ratings among blacks.

NBC is having the most difficult time attracting a black audience. Black households watch an average of 70 hours of television each week and white households watch 50 hours, the study said. The gap has steadily shrunk over the past five years.

Hate-crimes bill defeated

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHEYENNE, Wyo. — Four months after gay college student Matthew Shepard was beaten to death, a move to pass a hate-crimes bill in Wyoming was scuttled Wednesday by a legislative committee.

The committee killed two bills, and supporters said that ended their hopes for the year.

State lawmakers have rejected similar measures four times since 1995.

After Shepard's death in October, calls for a law increased. Republican Gov. Jim Geringer for the first time supported the passage of a bias-crimes law. Wyoming is one of nine states without bias-crimes legislation.

State Sen. John Schiffer, the committee chairman, said he hoped supporters of bias-crime legislation would come back in future sessions with legislation that would have broader support.

"This legislation as written does not fit with what this state wishes to have in a bias-crimes bill," said Schiffer, one of three people who voted against the bills.

Some opponents of the bills objected to listing motivating factors, such as race, religion and sexual orientation, saying they offered special protection to certain groups. Others said no new laws are needed, just strict enforcement of existing measures.

The measures that died in the Senate Judiciary Committee would have increased the maximum fine for a felony by up to $5,000 and the maximum prison sentence by up to five years if prosecutors could prove the crime was bias-related.

Once In A Lifetime

Sharing your engagement and wedding announcements
in the Collegian the first Friday of every month

Your engagement and wedding are special moments in your life and the Kansas State Collegian wants to help you share the news with family and friends. This semester you can put your announcement with a picture in the Collegian's "Once in a Lifetime" special section for FREE.

"Once in a Lifetime" runs the first Friday of every month: Oct. 3, Nov. 6 and Dec. 4. It will resume in the spring semester with the following publication dates: Feb. 5, March 5, April 2 and May 7.

To publish your announcement, please complete the attached form and mail it or take it to Student Publications, Kedzie 103 (east of the K-State Student Union). The deadline for getting your announcement in the paper will be the Wednesday preceding the publication date.

To place a FREE engagement or wedding announcement in the Collegian, complete and submit the following form with a photo to Kedzie 103.

JMC director orders KSDB programming change

■ Before Simon stepped in, some students called the new format discriminatory.

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KSDB is undergoing another format change — this time at the mandate of faculty — to return "Jam the Box," the urban music show, to an earlier time slot.

Thursday afternoon, Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, required "Jam the Box" be scheduled for the 8 p.m. to midnight time slot.

The decision came after several weeks of negotiations with members of the Black Student Union and KSDB student executive staff members.

The controversy over the program began when the radio station switched its programming format to modern rock.

The old DB92 music mix incorporated blocks of different music forms into various specialty shows.

When formatting changed, "Jam the Box" was rescheduled from the 5-9 p.m. slot to 11 p.m. to 3 a.m., said Jeremy Claeys, program manager at KSDB and junior in journalism. The time was changed to better fit with the modern rock format, not to get rid of urban music programming on the station, Claeys said.

"We would never cancel urban music because people like it," he said. "What we were trying to do was to gain the maximum amount of listeners for every time period. When you have a main-format type of station, like we're trying to start with ours, you need to deviate programming to niche times for niche audiences."

Claeys said statistics have shown more people enjoy listening to rock music during the day. Hip-hop, R&B, and other types of urban music are popular at night when people go out.

"Adding a different type of music in the middle of our programming segregates our audience," he said. "We lose the listeners we've been building up all day at 8 p.m., and we can't gain them back after midnight."

In a letter explaining the new mandate, Simon said members of student multicultural groups were concerned after they heard about the time change.

He said KSDB did not change the times for discriminatory reasons, but others may see it that way.

"I'm sure the radio station did this for programming reasons, and they never meant to be discriminatory in any way," Simon said. "But it could be seen as a demotion for the program, because the late time could cause the show to lose listeners."

Since the format changes at the beginning of this semester, Claeys said KSDB has received a lot of positive feedback from students, the community and even other radio stations.

"We are getting more students interested in working here, more underwriting and more student involvement than ever before," Claeys said. "The Lazer in Lawrence is talking about us, and 94.5 here in Manhattan is even changing their programming because of us."

"When you have stations from 100 miles away talking about you, and commercial stations changing their format to have more hip-hop music at night like you do, you have got to be doing something right," he said.

Dwain Archer, adviser of Black Student Union, said success should not be gained at the expense of cultural or minority groups.

"We can't find success with the denial of any group," he said. "If our success means some group has been demoted in some way, we have done a wrong."

Archer said the old DB92 format is better at recognizing the cultural diversity among students at K-State.

"K-State has always been a leader among universities in diversifying all groups on campus," Archer said. "This is not our nature to have taken programming opportunities away from any minority group. We're not the only group affected by this decision. What will happen to the others?"

Claeys said music genres are not defined by racial or ethnic groups.

"It's very wrong to say that a type of music is a certain people's music. Music does not correlate along racial lines," he said. "Urban music is a popular style of music with a large and diverse group of people. It just isn't what we are playing on our station right now."

As part of the format change this semester, the radio station also became a student-run organization. Although it is controlled by students, Simon said it is not an independent organization and the university still has authority to make executive decisions.

He used that authority to override KSDB's executive staff decision to keep programming in the 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. time slot.

Simon said he was reluctant to make the decision, but he felt it was necessary for the good of the entire university community.

"I found it very difficult to do this, because I like to see students run it themselves," he said. "I like to be involved as little as possible."

Claeys said he thought Simon received pressure from the university and the Office of Multicultural Affairs to mandate the time change.

"I think that at any other time, Simon would have stood up for student media rights at this campus," he said. "It just happens to be Black History Month and the 30th anniversary for BSU at K-State, and there were threats at some meetings by BSU to protest."

End in sight for Senate trial

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate voted Thursday for videotaped testimony by Monica Lewinsky in President Clinton's impeachment case after dealing a bipartisan brush-off to a personal appearance. Parts of her recorded deposition are to be played during the nationally televised trial session on Saturday.

As lawmakers settled that issue, Republicans retreated from their plan to find Clinton guilty of wrongdoing without removing him from office.

With those decisions, trial-weary senators moved to wrap up the impeachment proceeding by the end of next week.

"I do think it's time we get to a vote and we move on" to other issues, Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss, said.

Clinton's acquittal is assured on the charges of perjury and obstruction of justice, which stem from his efforts to conceal a sexual relationship with Lewinsky.

While Republicans backed away from their plan to find Clinton guilty of wrongdoing before the trial ends, Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle said lawmakers in his party were putting the finishing touches on a censure proposal. He said he wants it voted on either during an interruption in the proceedings or after the conclusion.

Under the Senate's decisions on Thursday, prosecutors and White

'Coming out' topic of Gingrich speech

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Candace Gingrich received two standing ovations Thursday night in the K-State Student Union Main Ballroom.

Gingrich, sister of former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich and project manager for the Human Rights Campaign National Coming Out Project, spoke on the importance of coming out, hate crime legislation, discrimination and the education system.

There is more than one step to coming out, Gingrich said. "When people talk about coming out they too often presume that you do it, then it's over," she said. "In reality, there are lots of different comings-out."

She said the first coming out includes a person accepting who he or she is as a gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgendered person. The second coming out is when a person is able to go to family members, friends or colleagues and confide in them. Gingrich said she had a third coming out when the entire public learned of her sexual orientation.

Unlike many people who are shunned after coming out, Gingrich

Service celebrates life of accident victim

About 40 friends and relatives gathered at All Faiths Chapel on Thursday afternoon to remember Christian Muck, sophomore in life sciences, who died from injuries received in a one-car accident Jan. 29.

At the front of the chapel was a small table covered with a cloth and mementos of Muck. A bouquet of flowers sat next to a lit candle, and pictures of him with friends and family were spread out on the table.

The Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities at K-State, welcomed everyone to the service and thanked friends and family members for attending.

"I met with Christian's roommates, and we decided to fashion the service in an informal way because we felt that Christian would be comfortable," he said. "This is to let everyone know that there are people that care, and the university cares, and that we are there for support."

The format for the service was informal. After an opening prayer led by The Rev. Karl Bunjes of the First Christian Church, Fallon encouraged anyone to share memories of Muck.

"We are also here to reflect on how to go away from this with a new commitment to life," Fallon said. "I want everyone to feel free to share the feelings you've experienced and are

Financial aid, payday loans give students cash options for emergencies

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Life gets expensive. Imagine a week when the bills weigh in at $400 and your wallet or purse contains only a lonely dollar bill. Sometimes the only solution in sight is a tradition probably almost as old as money itself — the quick loan.

Some help can be close. K-State's Office of Student Financial Aid has had its emergency loan program long enough that Jack Taylor, assistant director for the office, said he used it himself as a freshman in 1984.

Loans normally go up to $400 with the choice to repay in 30, 60 or 90 days, Taylor said. He said the only factors considered are whether the applicants are enrolled at K-State and if they already owe overdue money to some part of the university.

No interest is charged, although a fee is included in the payback, he said. For example, a $400 loan has a fee of $2.60 for 30 days, $5.33 for 60 and $7.33 for 90. The deadline to apply for an emergency loan this semester is 5 p.m. March 5.

Funds typically make it to the student within 24 hours, via a check from the Cashier's Office, but they can come in even faster and above $400 in cases of dire emergency such as a family death, he said.

There are consequences if the loan is not repaid by the agreed date. As long as students are delinquent on loans, they cannot pre-enroll, obtain a transcript or even graduate until the debt is paid, he said.

"It's important for the student to realize this is a short-term loan. It's important to us that they pay that back, because that money came to us through donations from other students," Taylor said.

An off-campus option for quick cash is the payday loan. Under this procedure, borrowers write a check for the borrowed amount plus a fee to the business offering the option. In return, the business agrees to cash the check after an agreed number of days.

At least two establishments in Manhattan offer payday loans.

Mister Money USA is one. The Manhattan office can loan up to $100 for two weeks or up to $250 for one week, Manager Angie Carlson said. Added interest and fees are the state limits, she said.

Aside from a form filled out for the corporate office's customer studies, Carlson said her business just needs photo identification, a home or work phone number and the personal check from the applicant. Checks are run through TeleCheck, a verification system designed to look for any current bouncing checks, she said.

In most cases, the whole process can yield a loan within five minutes, she said.

Insufficient funds checks are usually the only factor to cause denial, but other situations can delay the loan, Carlson said. New checking accounts or many checks written recently by the borrower can raise red flags on the system.

"It may delay it about a day," she said.

Carlson also said applicants can use only pre-printed checks and not the temporary ones issued by banks.

If the check cannot be covered by the borrower on the agreed day, she said the Manhattan store will hold it for about one more week with an additional $10 fee before it is turned over to TeleCheck and a $30 fee instead.

Brad Harper, the owner and operator of Manhattan Check Service, said his business can loan up to $100 for two weeks. An applicant needs a current bank statement, pay stub, photo ID and a piece of mail with a current address. The service charge is 15 percent of amount borrowed, he said.

Because the business does about 95 percent of its work as a collection agency, approval can take about 15 to 20 minutes as the applicant is checked for outstanding local checks, he said.

"We have a very wide picture of what this person is up to," he said.

Applicants sign a contract, agreeing to pay by a certain date, and extensions are rare, he said. Manhattan Check Service charges the full $30 fee for insufficient funds, Harper said.

"Our policy is to deposit the check no sooner than the date," Harper said.

This allows some processing time before it actually goes through the bank, but he said his advice is to take that date seriously and to avoid getting one loan after another.

"This is a very expensive way to handle things," Harper said. "Try not to string it out too long. Sit down, budget and get all your stuff straight so you don't become a regular customer."

D.C. Lehman, K-State instructor of finance, offers similar advice. Preventative maintenance and common sense can prevent the need for loans, she said. What most students' parents preached, but rarely taught, is good advice, she said.

"It sounds really simple, and it is. Very few parents teach their children how to budget," Lehman said.

PAYDAY LOANS

Important things to know

- Maximum time for a loan: 30 days
- Loans cannot be legally renewed. (Also, borrowers cannot have more than one simultaneous loan with the same loan office or several offices under the same parent company.)
- Maximum fee: loan of $50 or less: $5.50
- Maximum fee: loan $50 to $100: 10 percent of the amount loaned and a maximum of $5 for administrative fees.
- Maximum fee: loan $100 to $250: up to 7 percent of amount loaned (with a minimum of $10) and a $5 maximum administrative fee.
- Maximum fee: loan $250 to $800: 7 percent of the amount loaned (with a minimum of $10) and a $5 maximum administrative fee.
- Delinquent loans can charge 3 percent interest for every month beyond the agreed date the borrower hasn't paid, but Minihan said most lenders disregard the amount because it is so small.

Sunrise Legislative Forum offers chance for feedback

Local and area state legislators will be visiting Manhattan for the Annual Sunrise Legislative Forum at 8 a.m. Saturday at Manhattan Town Center.

Sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, the forum is conducted during the legislative session for updates on government issues concerning Manhattan and for feedback about what is being done about these issues.

Manhattan Chamber of Commerce Public Affairs Committee Chairman Dick Hayter, who has been attending the forums for 25 years, predicted a large turnout Saturday.

Among those who will be there are Republican Rep. Kent Glasscock of the 62nd District, Republican Rep. Jeff Peterson of the 66th District and Republican Sen. Lana Oleen of the 22nd District.

Manhattan Chamber of Commerce President Dan Colantone said the forum has proved to be effective in the past.

"They're very successful," Colantone said. "They give us a heads-up on key issues that might impact the community."

It's also an opportunity for chamber members and the public at large to hear more about what's happening in state government and how issues affect Manhattan and Riley County, as well as the surrounding area, he said.

The chamber has a legislative agenda, with several issues that are important to the community, that will be followed at the forum, Colantone said.

Some of the chamber's priorities include additional funding for economic tourism development, improving transportation around Manhattan through the Comprehensive State Transportation Program, and taxation dealing with business machinery and equipment property.

According to the 1999 Legislation, Policies and Priorities List, the chamber wants the Kansas Legislature to increase the tax-credit limit placed on businesses with property taxes on business machinery and equipment.

Members of the public are welcome to attend and ask questions, and Hayter said he encourages everyone to come.

"It will give them a chance to hear some recent actions in the legislature and issues that are being discussed of special interest to Manhattan," he said. "And, it also gives them time to ask questions of the legislators."

The public will be able to ask questions by writing them out and giving them to Hayter.

Hayter said he does it this way because many of the questions are similar and he tries to group them together.

Future Sunrise Legislative Forums will be the first Saturday of every month through April. There will be one in May, but it will involve the city commission.

Loud noise means fines for county's repeat offenders

The Riley County Police Department receives many calls in the wee hours of the night from angry neighbors complaining about noise.

"These noises can range from a barking dog, loud stereos and live bands," Lt. G.R. Grubbs of the RCPD said.

Grubbs said a noise violation is something that disturbs others, which invariably is a neighbor.

Students in residence halls also are calling the police because of the close proximities.

"It was around 12:30 a.m. on a Tuesday morning. My roommate and I called the police, and basically they came and knocked on the door," Somer Patterson, junior in English, said. "The neighbors saw them at the door and turned down the music immediately."

If noise from a party is heard by an officer 50 feet from a residence, the officer has cause to check it out. The city ordinance goes into effect after 10 p.m.

Most calls to the police are on the weekends, but they do vary.

When the police are notified, officers make contact with the owner or renter of the establishment. The police then ask them to get quiet as a warning. If the police are called again, a citation is issued with a fine.

Fines can range from $25 to $100 with a $45 court cost. If convicted, the location of violation is kept on record. Persons cited with a violation do not go to jail but pay a fine. No records of noise violation have been reported for the month of January.

"Noise violations happen seasonally, when students come back in August and during spring break," court secretary Stacy Keller said. "Prime-time outdoor activities are also another way for a noise violation to occur."

U.N. population forum strives for lower birth rates

TAMSTERDAM, Netherlands — With the world's population projected to hit 6 billion this year, a week-long U.N. population forum opening Sunday has taken on a new sense of urgency.

"The choice the world has to make — and make quickly — is to take action that allows for lower birth rates," said Dick Bell, a spokesman for the Washington, D.C.-based Worldwatch Institute.

"This is a very urgent problem and the industrialized countries need to face their responsibilities," he said.

In 1987, the world population was 5 billion. It is expected to hit 6 billion this year, an increase of 20 percent in just 12 years.

The program adopted in Cairo calls for universal access to affordable family planning, sexual health services and programs for adolescents by the year 2015. It also calls for universal access to primary education, measures to ensure gender equality, and significant reductions in infant and maternal mortality.

A leading issue will be the flagging financial commitment of U.N. members to programs for slowing overpopulation.

"It is clear they have fallen short of the goals and that the industrialized countries have not come forward with the cash they promised," Bell said. "It is imperative that the wealthy countries recognize the urgency of funding these programs."

Though the United States is the largest financial backer of global population programs and has spent more than $3 billion since 1994, its yearly contribution has declined. Undersecretary of State for Global Affairs Frank E. Loy said.

"We're still the leader, but it's clear we should be and I hope we will be doing more in the future," he said. "It is certainly my intent to work with Congress to see if we can gain some additional support for these programs."

Congress withdrew financial support for the U.N. Population Fund last year amid concerns among Republicans that it was a platform for promoting abortion elsewhere.

Miss Kansas USA competes for national title

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amanda Carraway, along with 300 million viewers, will watch her life unfold tonight.

CBS will televise the Miss USA Pageant live at 8 p.m. from The Grand Palace in Branson, Mo. The field of 51 delegates includes Carraway, Miss Kansas USA and a junior in public relations. It will be narrowed to 10 based on preliminary scores, and the finalists will go on to compete in the final evening gown, swimsuit and interview categories.

Contestants completed preliminary competition Monday, and Carraway said all she can do now is wait.

"It's hard, because our scores are locked in the computer, tabulated and already determined," she said. "It's out of my hands now. I feel like I did the best job that I could do, and whatever is meant for me will happen."

Monty Beisel, Carraway's boyfriend and a sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said Carraway's pageant director was optimistic.

"He told me that he thought Amanda had a real good chance of winning the preliminary swimsuit competition," Beisel said. "That would be big, because I know she will do well in interview and is excited about her dress for the evening gown. I think she has a real shot."

If she is crowned Miss USA, Carraway would travel to California to fulfill her duties. Kristy Waggoner, Carraway's roommate and a senior in elementary education, said a victory would be bittersweet.

"We hope she wins so bad, but at the same time, we don't want her to leave," she said. "We really want what is best, and this is her dream."

Carraway said she arrived Jan. 19 in Branson and has prepared nonstop since. Pageant rehearsals lasted about eight hours each day, and required publicity events were scheduled at night.

"A lot goes into getting ready for this caliber of a pageant," Carraway said. "We sometimes don't return until 11:30 or 12 at night, and that's the time when we're supposed to return messages and do the things we need to do. I took my pillow to rehearsal this morning because I was so tired."

Although the schedule has been rough, Carraway is no stranger to the pageant circuit. She won the Miss Kansas Teen title at age 16 and was crowned Miss Kansas USA last Sept. 26 in Wichita. She said those experiences gave her confidence.

"I think once you reach this level, you don't really get nervous," she said. "I was actually more scared because I didn't get butterflies on Monday night. I think that you're so prepared and you have rehearsed this thing so many times that it just seems like it's another rehearsal."

Waggoner said Carraway's stage presence will be noticeable to the audience.

"She is very comfortable onstage," she said. "There's a look on the girls who are uncomfortable and scared, and Amanda just doesn't have that look."

Though she was confident onstage, Waggoner said it was especially important for Carraway, whose parents and sister died in an car accident when she was 15, to have family and friends attend the pageant.

Beisel attended the preliminary competition and will be at the finals along with about 25 other friends and family members tonight.

"I think it meant a lot to her that we went down to see her and support her," he said. "This is a once-in-a-lifetime deal. I play football, so we kid around and say, 'It's kind of like being in the Super Bowl.'"

Proposal would reorganize UAB

■ University Activities Board would change format, name in effort to give better service to organizations.

By CAIT PURINTON
KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

The University Activities Board will no longer exist in its current form if a new Student Senate proposal passes in a few weeks.

A new board, the Student Activities Advisory Board, will take its place.

"We hope to have the legislation passed by the end of the term," Student Senate Special Committee Chair Dustin Petrik said.

The special committee was formed to examine how effective the current process is for campus organizations to register through the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Committee members said there was confusion on responsibilities and miscommunication within the current system, making the process inefficient. They looked at other Big 12 schools and compiled ideas to write a plan best suited for K-State.

At Thursday's Student Senate meeting, the seven-member committee presented the information they collected and made a proposal to improve the current system.

Business Senator Nick Mueeting said under the old system, it would take campus organizations a couple weeks to register with OSAS. If the proposal passes in legislation, registration will only take three days.

Under the old legislation, organizations have to wait for UAB to meet to approve their registration. With the committee's proposal, a new activity director will be in charge of all the paper work. That person would also be available on a daily basis to answer questions.

Senate Operations Committee Chair Josh Rengstorf said UAB cannot meet this semester, so one person is already doing the work.

"We're already ahead of ourselves," he said.

SAAB would be there to recommend changes to the groups' constitutions and help with the process of registering. The Board would also hear any appeals of groups denied of registration.

Student Senate Vice Chair Jake Worcester said the purpose of the board is to oversee things to make sure the process is running smoothly. He said they will act as an advisory board and make suggestions to Student Governing Association when they see problems arising.

The Allocations Committee would govern funding, including paperwork and assigned organization classifications. Before, UAB and the committee classified the organizations, which was inefficient and causing lack of communication.

In order for a group to become a new student organization, members can pick up the proper paperwork from OSAS, which is checked by the activities director. If the forms are complete and compliant with all rules and regulations, the group then writes a constitution. Once the paperwork is approved by the activities director, the Allocations Committee classifies the new organization for funding.

"We want to make sure the people who sign this information are looking at it carefully," Mueeting said. "If they have everything that is required, we have to register them."

OPINION EDITOR: KELLY FURNAS

By foot or on bicycle, respect is necessary

The most important aspect of the new bicycle program is something that is sorely missing now — enforcement.

The Bicycle Master Plan will improve bike routes, make parking available and encourage bicycle registration. All of this will help biker and pedestrian safety. What will help most is bikers following the rules that are already in place and being ticketed when they disobey those rules.

Dismount zones exist for a reason. It is not realistic for bicyclists to try to weave in and out of pedestrians between classes. There is nothing wrong with walking a bike through these areas, but riding one is just too dangerous.

K-State isn't necessarily set up for vehicles, whether they are bikes or cars. There are narrow streets and a shortage of bike paths. That's all the more reason bicyclists should take extreme caution when around pedestrians.

Safety goes both ways, though. It is just as important that pedestrians stay on crosswalks and stay out of bike paths. If it weren't for bicyclists, after all, there would be even more cars on campus and fewer parking spaces available.

The need for mutual respect is obvious, but that won't be enough. Enforcement must be in place to make sure that respect is given.

I completely disagree with Mary VanLeeuwen's column in Monday's Collegian. She just doesn't seem to realize that immature is funny. That's why bodily functions are so funny. They're immature, yet they're funny. She just needs to relax a little bit and enjoy college life.

I'm tired of seeing Asbury on the six o'clock news talking about how awful our guys are playing. I wouldn't want to play for a coach who doesn't have any faith in me.

I think that 91.9 should go back to DB92 and play all the crappy music that made the 12 people happy who are complaining about it now. What a bunch of whiners.

I thought this said, "For a good time." What the hell is this? You people make me sick.

I would just like to express my disappointment that a story wasn't written on Donald Asher. I find it quite an honor to have somebody who is a nationally known speaker come to our campus. Our newspaper didn't even cover it the following day.

I just want to say thanks to the UPC for the fun with wax, wax hands and candles the other day. It was free. I had a lot of fun, and the candles were great. Thanks a lot, UPC.

Impeach Asbury.

Loss to KU embarrasses university, team, fans

Editor,
Monday night, our Wildcat men's basketball team met up with intrastate rival Kansas. This was a highly anticipated matchup between one struggling basketball team and another struggling basketball team.

Kansas is a perennial power that is down this year due to youth, and the Wildcats are a team that is struggling to fulfill the mildest of expectations in this 1998-99 basketball season.

I do not claim to be an expert on basketball, so I will spare you any insight I might have as to how the game went. My point is to address the issue as to why we lost Monday evening and have maintained consistently the lamest team in the Big 12. This is the first real year that K-State fans have had any real reason for expectations out of our basketball program, having returned four seniors who have all contributed extended amounts of playing time over the last three years.

This is what has become of Coach Tom Asbury's 1998-99 campaign. Our head coach can't seem to fire up his returning All-Big 12 performer of just a year ago to get to any level of consistent play. He has not been able to wrap up games in which big leads were lost to formidable opponents, (Indiana and conference opener Oklahoma State) and has had two embarrassing losses at home against rivals Missouri and, most recently, Kansas. All of these are games in which great amounts of confidence was lost due to the manner in which we lost. You can write off any road game for the Cats, because in the three years of the Big 12, Asbury has been able to get only one victory out of his program. This all spells out to not getting the job done. I suggest we begin to look elsewhere for our remedy to our ailing basketball program. Maybe Coach Bill Snyder wouldn't mind coaching out the rest of the season. What do you know about basketball, Bill?

Asbury is not the only problem with our basketball team, though. The truth is, he inherited a once-proud basketball program that slowly has descended to the bottom tier of the conference, left to play out its home games in the mausoleum we call Bramlage Coliseum. Everyone who watched the game on television Monday night saw a packed, exciting and electric coliseum for the first 15 minutes of the game. Then Bramlage returned to normal in the second half, the Jayhawks' house. I am sure this was the first sellout of the season and probably the first sellout since the last KU game, when all of its fans bought up the thousands of remaining tickets. Anyone who goes out to Bramlage during the season knows that we rarely "pack the purple palace." This place is dead. Why do we not acknowledge this? Or have we just accepted that this is where we sent basketball to die? Please wake up, make the needed renovations to Ahearn Field House and let us see if we can ever beat KU again. Maybe the football team can make a big weight room out of Bramlage, or how about increased stadium renovation?

I have been here four years and have seen no improvement out of the men's team in these four years. Monday night's embarrassing loss to Kansas was the defining moment in Asbury's five years here, and now it is time to move on. The Jayhawks made our team look silly, a feat that hasn't been difficult for opposing coaches in the last five years. A night that was supposed to put our team back in the chase for a berth in the NCAA Tournament ended up a shameful 69-46 drubbing of a team that I will no longer watch until big changes are made. Our football team should drop out of the top 10 for this embarrassment.

BROADEN your Horizons

Lawrence offers cultural experiences, acceptance of individuality

The KU vs. K-State basketball game roused some suppressed memories of mine. When the pep band started playing Jayhawk songs, I couldn't help but sing along. How did I know all of the words and melodies? What was wrong with me? Was I Baby Jay in a former life? I don't think so. Was I a crimson girl? "Not bloody likely," I consoled myself. What, then, was going on? Oh, it's all starting to come back. I think I was raised in Lawrence. Yes, I'm sure of it, my roots are red and blue.

This was very distressing to me. The first 18 years of my life were lost. I finally decided, being the scientific mind that I am, that four years of purple, all purple and nothing but purple had brainwashed me of any fond memories of that city 90 miles from Manhattan, and I ain't talkin' about Emporia.

I love K-State. I love the people, I love the small-town atmosphere and I love the campus and the beautiful surrounding country. However, K-State lacks a few important qualities that KU provides, namely things to do besides drink.

Despite the fact that my grandfather received his master's and doctoral degrees in physics from KU, my dad graduated with a bachelors in business administration from Daisy Hill, my aunt and uncle both walked down The Hill, and my mom worked for the KU Alumni Association for more than eight years, I chose to attend the archrival of KU. To this day, after I get a funny look, people ask me why I'm here at K-State.

The really cool people (read blatant sarcasm) smile and say that I just picked the "right" university in Kansas. The really, really cool people comment on how I freed myself from my roots and say I saw the light. Maybe they're referring to that spot of light they always see because they stared at the sun too long, because Manhattan just isn't that bright to me.

Then the people who are just so stupid that I'm not going to waste valuable sarcasm on them, say my choice has to do with not wanting to go to "Gay-U." Idiots. These are the people that cause me grief and make me wish I had gone to KU, but that will be addressed later.

No, I attend K-State because I like the people, save the aforementioned idiots, because it's fairly close to home so I can mooch groceries from my parents and because the thought of college being a continuation of high school, complete with all of my high school friends, sickened me. I loved them, and still do, but I wanted the heck out of Dodge — pardon the expression, you plethora of people from that rank-smelling town.

Overall, Manhattan has been pretty good to me. I finally have a boyfriend who doesn't wear Wranglers or KISS T-shirts; at least I hope he doesn't. The people here are so much friendlier than Lawrenceans, where they might look at you if you want directions, but don't get your hopes up. Lastly, I love K-State because I have met some of my dearest friends here that I value so much since they're like me. Cheesy, I know, but true.

But, as fond as I am of Manhattan, Lawrence wins in the overall award. There's actually something to do there besides drink. Nationally recognized bands play there on a regular basis. There's a tolerance of individuality that is sorely missing here at K-State. Cultural events happen all the time.

Lawrence is the cultural oasis of Kansas.

In high school, concerts like The Offspring, Poe, Stabbing Westward, Nine Inch Nails, Lollapalooza and Tori Amos were accessible without having to drive for hours. Even non-rock concerts were in abundance — internationally known orchestras, quartets, choirs, operas and plays regularly showed at the Lied Center.

Liberty Hall alone outshines all of Manhattan's attempts to show movies other than mainstream flicks. How many of you saw the Golden Globe Awards and didn't know who the recipient of the award for best actress in a drama, Cate Blanchet, was, or had never heard of the movie "Elizabeth" for which role she won her award? That's because no theater in Manhattan would show the movie. Although UPC's Kaleidoscope Film Committee does its best to bring in non-mainstream movies, the attendance at these showings is pathetic. Back to those idiots mentioned earlier and the tolerance KU has for individuality. Since attending K-State, I have heard more lewd, crude and rude homosexual jokes and comments than I thought were out there. The majority of people in this area, maybe all of Kansas, don't have the respect for individuality that Lawrence and KU do. But that's not to say that just because someone goes to the University of Kansas means he or she is a homosexual. In fact, just because a person attends KU doesn't even mean that he or she has a tolerance for homosexuality, but the majority of people there do. One person at KU has so much more respect for a person's personal choice than 10 K-State students do.

I have heard so many crass comments about the Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Society and its members here at K-State that I want to vomit. Why can't idiots here and elsewhere just let others go about their business?

Finally, the cultural events lacking from this neck of the woods that were mentioned before aren't just for the artistic types. In fact, attending these events would benefit the general public and culturally secluded more than the stereotypical artsy-fartsy types. You know what's sad? K-State brings in good plays, concerts and events, but nobody knows about them or cares to attend them. You guys, there's a whole world out there that's not anything like Manhattan. I dare you to go to one event at McCain Auditorium this semester. Who knows, maybe someday you'll meet the man, woman, employer of your dreams, and when they find out that your horizons aren't that broad they'll laugh and walk away. OK, hopefully nobody's that rude, but it's the idea that I'm trying to get across.

Get your feet wet in the events offered here at K-State, and then if you like what you see and hear, go try out Lawrence. Work your way up to Kansas City or Denver. Hey, you could end up on the East Coast before you know it, talking to a dream date who is so impressed that you saw the musical "Rent" (the greatest musical of our time, in my opinion) and that you know something about the arts, that you'll fall madly in love and run off to Europe where there's a cornucopia of knowledge and culture that the United States probably will never know. At least that's my dream.

Hate-crime laws would serve as important symbols

One of the small debates that has been showing up every now and then on our national radar screen is whether hate-crime laws should be extended to homosexuals. This hit the nation in a big way last October after the brutal beating murder of Matthew Shepard.

Opponents to having hate-crime laws extended to homosexuals are mostly socially and religiously conservative. While many of these people believe that homosexuality is in itself morally abhorrent, not all in this camp feel this way.

What they do hold in common is that such hate-crime laws will provide special rights to homosexuals that will not apply to anyone else. They argue that there already exist laws against committing such crimes against anyone regardless of sexual orientation. What difference does it make, it is reasoned, if one is a victim of a violent crime just because that person is in the wrong place at the wrong time or because that person is singled out due to some affiliation to a disliked group? Both individuals are being victimized equally.

Furthermore, those opposed to hate-crime laws are afraid the rest of the country might follow suit of some of the more liberal areas of the country, which seem to have an overabundance of hate-crime laws to the point of absurdity (in Washington, D.C., it is against the law to target someone for a crime just because that person is a student).

Then there are those few like Professor Robert Shoop who, while adamantly against discrimination of any kind against homosexuals, believe in putting more into grass roots efforts to change attitudes about gays, lesbians and bisexuals and that effort spent on passing hate-crime laws is effort misdirected (although Shoop did state in his column in last week's Collegian that he was not against such laws).

I disagree with all these premises. First, hate-crime laws do not give special rights to anyone. It is not as if homosexuals under such laws will get free ice cream on Thursdays while the rest of us have to pay for ours. Hate-crime laws, if anything, provide special protection for certain groups of people that have, on a regular basis, been victims of crimes solely because these people are associated with a particular group.

No one seems to be complaining about special laws that protect battered wives from their battering husbands. In fact, every time the system fails and a protected wife still ends up getting beaten, the society as a whole is generally so outraged that stronger laws for protecting wives are called for. Why should there be stronger laws, or any special laws at all, for protecting battered wives? Isn't getting beat up just the same if you're a battered wife or some guy on the street? Well, no, there is a difference; a big difference. The difference is that being a battered wife, or a black person or a homosexual, makes one more likely to be a victim of a violent crime because they are targets singled out by certain hateful people.

In addition, it is not so much the result of a crime that is important in determining punishment, but the intent of the crime. Should a person who unconsciously runs a stop sign and incidentally kills a pedestrian receive the same punishment as the drunk driver who runs over and kills a pedestrian because the driver's senses were impaired by alcohol, and should these previous two receive the same punishment as the bigot who maliciously runs over and kills a black pedestrian just because this person is racist? The pedestrians in each of these three examples are all equally dead, so all should receive the same punishment, right?

Is it not worse to victimize a person just because the victim is a homosexual than to victimize a person because that person just happened to be unlucky enough to be the one to get mugged at that particular moment? Both crimes are abhorrent, but the preceding crime is even more so and thus should have an additional penalty associated with it; one for the violent act itself, and one for acting out on the malevolent attitude.

As far as whether extending hate-crime laws to homosexuals might lead to a plethora of hate-crime laws for any and every imaginable group, so be it. On one hand, the opponents to hate-crime laws say these laws provide special rights that apply to only a specific group of people, but on the other hand, these same opponents are also afraid of an overabundance of hate-crime laws to all groups. Does this not seem a bit contradictory?

A further contradiction is that these opponents to hate-crime laws are the same social conservatives who have been trying to get more and stiffer penalties associated to all other crimes. I guess our society needs to be tougher on crime unless the crime is directed toward homosexuals.

With the case of Shepard, under current Wyoming law, if the alleged perpetrators are found guilty, they will be candidates for the death penalty. So how much more could a hate-crime law punish over existing law? Well, not much, particularly if the perpetrators are executed anyway. However, a hate-crime law would be an important symbol stating that in this society, acting out on one's bigotry is intolerable. Symbols are important. That way the social conservatives, along with many others, become upset when they see the American flag burn. Is not the American flag more than just a colored piece of cloth?

Most important of all is that homosexuals want the same thing that all people want: to feel as if they matter. There are many places in this country where it is still legal to discriminate against gays, let alone not be stigmatized for beating the tar out of them. The fundamental values for which this country was founded upon are diametrically opposed to having any segment of our society made insignificant. Extending hate-crime laws to protect homosexuals probably will not change many people's attitudes about gays, but if it helps this one segment of our inclusive society feel consequential, then passing such laws will not be effort misdirected.

Hussein retreats after continued air strikes

Iraqis pull back from no-fly zone after one-fifth of air defenses destroyed

By LAURA MYERS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — American and British missiles and bombs have destroyed about one-fifth of Iraq's air defenses, most in the past five weeks of cat-and-mouse clashes between Western warplanes and Saddam Hussein's pilots and anti-aircraft batteries, Pentagon officials said.

Iraq has suffered about 40 hits on its air defense sites since Dec. 28, when the Iraqi military began attacking U.S. and British fighters patrolling no-fly zones over northern and southern Iraq, U.S. defense officials said. That is more than during December's four-day allied bombing campaign. About two-thirds of the 34 Iraqi air defense sites targeted in the Dec. 16-19 airstrikes were hit.

In response, Hussein has pulled back his least-mobile anti-aircraft missile batteries from the no-fly zones in recent days, Defense Secretary William Cohen said Thursday.

"He has lost some of his capability and people in the last couple of weeks, so I think it's a wise decision on his part," Cohen said in an interview aboard an Air Force jet en route to Madrid, Spain, on the first leg of an eight-day trip to Europe and Africa.

"It's clear from his recent actions that he doesn't want to lose all of his SAMs," Cohen said, referring to the network of surface-to-air missiles that have been targeting allied planes. "To the extent that he poses a threat to our forces in the region, then they are going to be hit."

The question remains whether it's only a temporary retreat by Iraq, which this year has challenged no-fly zones more than 80 times by trying to shoot down allied warplanes or targeting them with radar.

"We have seen a pattern of him moving what he considers high-value assets around before," said Air Force Major Joe LaMarca, spokesman for U.S. Central Command.

Thursday morning, U.S. pilots patrolling southern Iraq spotted two Iraqi MiG-23 fighter jets in the no-fly zone but took no action before the planes fled, according to the Pentagon.

Later, an Iraqi leader reiterated his nation's defiance of the no-fly zones, which Iraq considers a violation of its sovereignty. "Iraq will persist in its resistance of the planes belonging to American and British aggressors violating our national airspace," Abdul-Ghani Abdul-Ghafur, member of the regional command of the ruling Baath party, told the official Iraqi News Agency.

Navy Capt. Michael Doubleday, a Pentagon spokesman, was just as adamant that the Clinton administration would respond to any Iraqi aggression with swift military action.

"We will continue to answer them with strikes," Doubleday said. "We believe that we are having a very grave impact on the Iraqi air defense system. We have diminished his ability."

Meanwhile, the Clinton administration appears to be expanding from simply firing at anti-aircraft sites in self-defense to launching more offensive attacks like Tuesday's strike against three Iraqi anti-ship missile launchers near the Gulf.

Recent targets also have included defense-associated command and control sites.

One key U.S. ally already has complained. Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit said the U.S. attacks "seem to have gone too far."

The U.S. military uses the Incirlik Air Base in Turkey as a base of operations for enforcing the northern no-fly zone. As a precaution against a possible retaliatory Iraqi missile attack, the United States — at Turkey's request — deployed a Patriot anti-missile battery at Incirlik last week.

Overall, the Pentagon estimates it has reduced Iraq's air defense system by 20 percent since the mid-December airstrikes, launched after Iraq refused to cooperate with U.N. weapons inspections.

Retired Marine Gen. Bernard Trainor said U.S. military leaders would prefer a full-scale assault to destroy Iraq's air defense system but won't go ahead because Arab nations are likely to object.

"Doing it in dribs and drabs, from a military standpoint, is not the desirable way to do it because you're putting pilots at risk," said Trainor, co-author of "The General's War: The Inside Story of the Conflict in the Gulf." "But there's no question, his defenses have been degraded."

Plan affects transfer hours

Higher-ed proposal could take hassle out of transferring credit hours

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Transferring credit hours from one Kansas school to another could be less difficult if proposed plans to restructure Kansas' higher education system are passed by the Kansas Legislature.

The Higher Education Structure for Excellence would create two governing bodies in an effort to unify higher education institutions.

The plan calls for a board of trustees to be established to oversee the state's community colleges and vocational/technical institutions. The Kansas Board of Regents would continue to govern the six regents universities, and a higher education coordinating council, made up of seven governor-appointed members, would be responsible for coordination between all sectors of higher education.

The higher education coordinating council would provide institutions with necessary information for judging the quality of programs and courses.

With better communication between institutions, students would be able to transfer credit hours more easily from one Kansas school to another, administrative assistant Stacia Wohlford said.

"This allows students to transfer and not lose two years' worth of work," she said.

President Jon Wefald said the current system for transferring credits is working well right now with minimal challenges. He said the council could be helpful if problems were to occur.

"It certainly wouldn't hurt anything," Wefald said. "If there are any glitches, they certainly can help. That would be their job."

Lt. Gov. Gary Sherrer, chairman of the task force that submitted the plan, said it is important the bill have positive effects for students.

"If students aren't going to benefit from it, we ought not to be doing it," Sherrer said.

There is now no system to regulate differences in curriculum and course requirements among institutions, Wohlford said. Institutions can set any requirements they want to without consulting other institutions for uniformity.

"If there's a high-level turf war going on, there's no one now to resolve it," Wohlford said.

The new plan also would create avenues for fixing other conflicts.

For instance, there is now no way to resolve duplications of classes among universities, said Sheila Frahm, executive director for the Kansas Association of Community College Trustees. If a school wants to offer a new course, but it resembles one at a neighboring school, those schools will compete for students, Frahm said.

Frahm said the new plan would help eliminate the duplication problem.

"The primary component is that there would be a central coordinating agency that would review curriculum and programs," said Duane Dunn, Manhattan Area Technical College President.

However, the plan can't change the duplication of general education classes, said Paul Maneth, dean of academic affairs at Barton City Community College.

All community colleges and regents universities offer a core of classes that needs to be consistent, Maneth said.

For instance, Maneth said students taking a basic English composition class should be able to transfer the class to any institution in Kansas.

Maneth said he is seeing more cooperation among community colleges toward a common outcome.

"We're working harder at cooperating together about the quality of the products and their roles in higher education," Maneth said.

Maneth said the community colleges have little difficulty transferring classes to the universities, so he isn't sure if the plan will improve things.

"Transferring will still require cooperation and coordination, and I don't know if that plan is going to solve those problems," Maneth said.

There now are two separate state agencies that evaluate curriculum, one that handles community colleges and vocational/technical schools and another that handles regents universities. "The coordinating council would bring information together from the two state agencies," Dunn said.

Dunn said the council would increase the chances for students to articulate and transfer credit hours.

There would be fewer people involved and more consistency in class evaluations, so the credit-transferring process might become faster, Dunn said.

The council would ease the process, there would be less red tape and there would be fewer people to go through, Dunn said.

"In the long run, it would be easier for students," Dunn said.

The new plan will require more consistency among schools, Maneth said.

"The board will force all entities to find common ground," Maneth said. "Now, they treat each other with common courtesy. Right now, there's nothing that says they have to work together."

Maneth said the plan is too new to form any opinions about, especially since there have been so many other plans in the past to restructure higher education.

"It's a little early to say this is the greatest thing that's ever happened in Kansas," Maneth said.

Dialogues address diversity issues

By CORY LAFFERTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A diversity dialogue in Hale Library on Thursday focused on the success of American ethnic studies courses and ways to improve the curriculum.

The dialogues, which began in 1997 with a one-time event during Racial and Ethnic Harmony Week, are monthly and are sponsored by the Multicultural Research and Resource Center of Hale Library and the American Ethnic Studies Program.

"We try to find out how to continue to do diversity activities and how to improve them," said Todd Nicewonger, senior in speech and member of AESP. "We try to find what makes them successful and what other activities need to be done to campus."

The number of people at the dialogue varies, Nicewonger said. Most of the dialogue is open discussion, but there is a suggested topic to get the audience started.

"When you are sitting there, you get to search for who we are and what we are doing here," said Quinton Shaw, member of the Native American Student Body.

One problem that has come up during the dialogues is the lack of proper communication and organization between the different diversity projects.

"A challenge that I have noticed in trying to build diversity is that there are pockets of activity that we don't know are going on," Molly Royse, coordinator of multicultural services, said. "We need a central point where everyone can send information, then when we see what is not covered we can address those needs."

K-State and society as a whole must be ready to face diversity issues, Royse said.

"There is a growing awareness of diversity among students because they are expected to be informed so they can live in a more diverse society," she said.

"It's predicted that in the year 2010 the majority will be the minority, so students need to be prepared for this."

The dialogues involve a spectrum of people on campus. There are representatives from the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, the NASB and others. Representatives from the various colleges also attend.

Faculty and staff from around campus also are a part of the dialogue.

"This is my fourth year here, and people are starting to come together, and things are getting done," Shaw said. "This was my first dialogue, but I have heard about these before. It's a lot of discussion back and forth, which is good."

The Diversity Dialogues are each month in the Hemisphere Room of the library. The next dialogue will be noon March 4.

"People will be surprised by what they hear, and at the same time will be really interested," Nicewonger said.

Senate support growing for grocery-tax proposal

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Supporters of a proposal to eliminate the state's sales tax on groceries are getting closer to having enough support to win approval for a plan.

The Senate on Thursday rejected a proposed amendment to phase out the 4.9 percent tax over four years, but the vote — 17-22 — was only four votes short of the minimum needed for passage.

Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, had tried to get the amendment to phase out the food tax added to a bill that would exempt purchases made for religious groups from the sales tax.

Hensley offered his amendment the same day the House voted 86-36 to approve a bill containing a similar proposal.

According to new estimates from the Legislature's staff, phasing out the food sales tax would save consumers nearly $75 million during the 12 months beginning July 1. After the sales tax was eliminated in 2002, consumers would save nearly $259 million a year.

Supporters have worried a food sales tax proposal would become bottled up in the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee. Both Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, and the committee's chairwoman, Sen. Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, are unenthusiastic about the idea.

"There's the potential there to have several more conservative votes," said Sen. Stan Clark, R-Oakley, who voted for the Senate amendment. "I think this really gives us more momentum."

In both chambers, Republican leaders said the Legislature shouldn't debate the food sales tax proposal so early in the session and should instead wait until other important budget decisions are discussed.

They also complained about supporters trying to attach their plans to other bills leaders had hoped to pass quickly.

In the House, supporters added the proposal to a bill allowing five counties to levy local sales taxes.

Langworthy told her colleagues a food sales tax plan will get a fair hearing in her committee. Bond described the idea as "clearly on the table."

Still, supporters of eliminating the food sales tax were determined to send a message: Their idea is too popular to be buried in committee.

"The strategy is to make the issue alive," said House Minority Leader Jim Garner, D-Coffeyville. "It certainly is that now."

Republican Gov. Bill Graves has opposed eliminating the food sales tax, arguing that tax relief should go primarily to the poor. Last year, he successfully advocated an increase in rebates to poor families for the taxes they pay on food.

Sykes employs students

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The service numbers in computer manuals don't always reach the manufacturer.

Instead, they might reach a K-State student technician working at Sykes Enterprises Inc. in Manhattan.

Sykes, the first company to enter Manhattan's Corporate Technology Park near the Manhattan Regional Airport, began training technicians in August 1998. Sykes now employs 520 people from the Manhattan area.

IVAN KOZAR/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sykes Enterprises Inc., which serves as a consultant and solves computer problems, was the first business to move into Manhattan's Corporate Technology Park, near the Manhattan Regional Airport.

Julie Weingardt, customer support center director, said 14 percent of the employees are part-time, and most of them are K-State students.

Weingardt said the company contracts with manufacturers of hardware and software for computer producers. She said agents are trained specifically on a make or model of computer, so when customers call, they can walk them through their problem.

Sykes still is looking for employees with good customer-service skills, dependability, responsibility and keyboard knowledge. Weingardt said that while computer knowledge is helpful, it is not required. Training is provided for new employees.

Sha Rone, a technician at Sykes and resident of Junction City, said the company offered him a good job opportunity, and he has encouraged others to apply for jobs at Sykes.

"I thought it would be pretty good with the way they schedule around classes, and I wanted to learn more about computers," he said.

Rone said he likes the location because it's near Fort Riley, where he is taking classes. He also said it is convenient if he ever plans to take classes at K-State.

Weingardt said Manhattan has been an excellent location for the company, but Sykes is hoping new businesses will develop in the area.

"I'm hoping that it will be a positive thing," she said.

She also said new businesses hopefully would attract food establishments to the area and increase the availability of public transportation.

Western Wireless Corporation, a wireless communication service, will soon enter the business park. Ann Harts, vice president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said the city's Economic Development Committee is working on packages with other companies.

Harts said Sykes has been a good addition to the community because it has provided jobs for more than 500 people, and it will pay $10 to $15 million in wages annually.

"That's a whole lot of money going back into the community," she said.

Sykes also wants to help the community in other ways, Weingardt said.

"We're trying to work out something with our neighbors on Eureka Drive for a litter-control program," she said.

Weingardt said the program would be similar to the adopt-a-highway program, and the employees would be involved in the litter control.

"We're trying to be a good contributing corporate citizen of the community," she said.

Recruits give Cats added depth

By signing 25 high school and transfer students, the K-State football team acquired players with potential to help the Wildcats' immediate concerns and affect future seasons.

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A complex recruiting season fraught with de-commitments, re-commitments and coaching changes finally came to an end Wednesday as 25 football players signed letters of intent to attend school and play football at K-State.

The class was composed of 17 high school players and eight community college transfers and featured 11 defensive and 14 offensive players.

Head coach Bill Snyder praised the signings and downplayed concerns that broken verbal commitments and assistant coach defections had hampered the Wildcats' recruiting efforts this season.

"Overall," Snyder said, "we like the balance in this class, which represents recruits at every position on both sides of the ball."

"We had some initial commitments that did not stay with us, but at no time did we go to a second-level player or to someone we felt we wouldn't have taken had we gotten that initial recruit."

Areas of concern entering recruiting included the interior defensive line, wide receiver, quarterback and left tackle, Snyder said. He said he thought the staff had done a good job of addressing those priorities during the recruiting season.

"I think that one of the more pressing concerns was interior defensive linemen," Snyder said. "I'd like to think that was met."

The Wildcats did indeed stock up on defensive linemen, signing tackles Anthony Bates, Jason Cedeno, Mario Fatafeh and Corey White, and ends Cliff Holloman, Thomas Houchin and Andrew Shull.

Also joining the defense are linebackers Josh Buhl, Terry Pierce and Bryan Hickman, and cornerback Alan Walker, all of whom are coming from the high school ranks.

On the offensive side of the ball, one of the Wildcats' most important signings was quarterback Eli Roberson III. The 6-foot-1-inch, 190-pound freshman has similar skills to departing star Michael Bishop and will be groomed to replace him eventually.

"He has characteristics that Michael has in regards to his physical makeup," Snyder said. "He's a mobile young guy, he can do a lot of the things we do. I think he's a diverse young guy and a good, skilled player."

"He's not quite as big, not quite as strong, (as Bishop) but the very positive thing is that we'll have him for four years, perhaps five. I think having a chance to be in the system longer will be a great advantage for him."

The Wildcats addressed another area of concern by adding four pairs of hands for him to throw to: tight end Thomas Hill, wide receiver George Williams, a community college transfer from California, and a pair of high school students from Colorado, LaRoy Bias and Derrick Evans, also wide receivers.

"I think we needed a wide receiver that could perhaps come in and play," Snyder said. "How pressing that is remains to be seen, but I think that was a concern."

Snyder also said left tackle was a concern, and his staff colared four candidates in high school offensive linemen Ben Rettele and John Gardner and community college transfers Oshin Honarchian and Matt Martin.

While the 6-foot-10-inch, 280-pound Gardner and the 6-foot-7-inch, 260-pound Rettele have potential written all over their frames, Snyder said some seasoning might be required before the pair is ready to take its place in the lineup.

"They're never recruited with the idea that a freshman would come in and play right away," Snyder said. "It doesn't mean that they wouldn't have an opportunity or a chance, they certainly would, but that's not the idea."

In the wake of K-State's pass-protection struggles in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl, Snyder said he might look to Honarchian for short-term relief.

"We needed to look at an offensive left tackle," he said. "I like what I've seen. He's a very competitive young guy, a good player."

Rounding out the class on offense is running back, which, based on numbers alone, might prove to be the most competitive position in the recruiting class. The running back recruits averaged 1,784 yards and 27 touchdowns among them last season.

Led by Wichita Northwest's Rashad Jackson, generally regarded as the best running back in the state of Kansas, the running back recruits also include talented high school students Rashad Washington, Danny Morris and Brandt Quick and 260-pound community college transfer Joe Hall.

—BILL SNYDER
HEAD FOOTBALL COACH

RECRUITING WAR

K-State signed recruits from nine different states but none east of Louisiana or north of California.

FUN FACTS

Texas teammates

■ Linebackers Josh Buhl and Bryan Hickman and defensive lineman Corey White were teammates at North Mesquite High School in Dallas.
■ Defensive lineman Jason Cedeno and quarterback Eli Roberson were teammates at Lee High School in Baytown, Texas.

All-Americans

■ Five of the community-college players earned All-America status in 1998, including three first-team picks.
■ Eight of the high school players earned All-America status in 1998.

Breakdown

■ K-State recruited four offensive linemen, six defensive linemen, three linebackers, five running backs, three wide receivers, one defensive back, one tight end and one quarterback.

Familiar faces

■ Defensive end Cliff Holloman played for new K-State assistant coach Jim Gush at Garden City (Kan.) Community College.
■ Fullback Brandt Quick attended the same high school (New Orleans Jesuit) as K-State running back coach Michael Smith.
■ Wide receiver Derrick Evans attended the same high school (Montbello, in Denver) as current K-State linebacker Da'Von Brame.

TODD STEWART/COLLEGIAN

K-State, Colorado face similar concerns

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Something's got to give this weekend in Colorado when the K-State women's basketball team battles the Buffaloes, who are tied with the Cats and Nebraska for fifth place in the Big 12 Conference.

Colorado, 12-10, returns to the court after its first loss in four games, falling Wednesday night to KU 65-57 on the road. Young players have been key for the Colorado basketball team this season.

"They're an extremely balanced ball club," Coach Deb Patterson said. "The Buffaloes are like us with respect to having a lot of underclassmen playing significant minutes for their program."

The Cats are looking to redeem themselves after two Big 12 losses to Texas A&M and Kansas. This week's bye has given them time to focus on a win in Boulder. The players said that in order to win, they must play with more desire.

"I think we have to come out with the intensity and energy and just play hard and execute," freshman guard Kristin Rethman said. "Colorado plays a similar kind of game as KU — getting in the passing lanes and being very aggressive — so we just have to expect it and be ready for it and play each possession hard and intense."

With the Buffaloes having four players who alternate at point guard, Patterson said she will be looking to Rethman to match up with Colorado's freshman shooting guard Jenny Roulier.

"Jenny Roulier is just a very experienced, rock-solid two-guard," Patterson said. "She can shoot the ball, and she can break you down off the dribble, which plays very well in the triangle offense. We counter that with Rethman, who has a great stroke — I think better than Roulier."

"I think on the perimeter it will be a very interesting matchup. We come off that Kansas game needing to see our guards step up and handle the kind of pressure they're going to see at Colorado."

Cats focus on ending conference road woes

The K-State men's basketball team will look to improve on its 1-19 all-time Big 12 Conference record on the road as it travels to Ames, Iowa, to battle with the Iowa State Cyclones on Saturday afternoon.

Attempting to recover from a heartbreaking 69-46 defeat at the hands of intrastate rival KU, the Wildcats, 14-8 on the season and 3-6 in the Big 12, find themselves in the middle of the Big 12 race and desperately needing a victory.

"I think at this point we are rallying the troops," assistant coach Butch Hawking said. "We have great kids, we have tough kids and we plan to go into Ames looking for a win."

"We're all disappointed after the KU game, but have to regroup and focus on the next task at hand."

Iowa State, 13-9 and 4-5 in the Big 12, is one game ahead of the Cats at seventh in the Big 12 standings and will come into the contest trying to bounce back from a 72-41 loss to Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla., on Tuesday.

Before the setback, the Cyclones dropped Nebraska 52-47 in Ames but had won three straight in Big 12 play earlier this season.

Hawking said Iowa State will be a tough contest because of its well-coached offensive game plan.

"They have a very methodical, 'lull you to sleep' offensive game," he said. "They maintain focus during the entire duration of the shot clock. We will need to have an alert defense. If we fall asleep on defense, they will make us pay."

To win, the Cats will have to keep a handle on sophomore Marcus Fizer, who averages 18.1 points per game and pulls down 7.8 rebounds per game. The 6-foot-8-inch power forward holds such honors as Big 12 Newcomer of the Year, Big 12 Third Team member and Big 12 Freshman of the year.

Hawking said it will be difficult to contain Fizer on Saturday.

"It won't be easy," he said. "He is one of the premiere players in the country. We will have to step up. He is very talented and very physical. He is definitely a defensive player to reckon with."

In addition to Fizer, Iowa State

K-State forward Manny Dies blocks a shot by Iowa State's Paul Shirley last season in Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats will travel to face the Cyclones for the first time this season Saturday afternoon in Ames, Iowa.

receives strong showings from sophomore forward Martin Rancik, who averages 10.6 points per game, and junior guard Michael Nurse, who pours in 10 a night.

"Those guys will play most of the game, and they like to hold opponents in the 50s," Hawking said. "We need to continue to play good defensive but be more effective on the offensive end. We have to move the ball and be patient."

Hawking also said K-State's rebounding, as always, will play an important role in the outcome of the contest.

With junior forward Tony Kitt and senior forward Manny Dies controlling the Wildcats' inside game, K-State is among the leaders in rebounding in the Big 12 conference but is 0-4 in games in which it has not out-rebounded its opponents.

Last year, the Wildcats split the series with the Cyclones to beat them at home 77-49 but lost in Ames 62-63.

In the contest at Ames, Fizer exploded for the Cyclones to score 27 points.

With only seven games left in the season, head coach Tom Asbury said the Wildcats must play well to end the season.

"Every single game is important," he said. "We better start playing here on out. We could win every game here on out — they are all winnable games."

"But every game is crucial for us. We're gonna have to make up some distance."

Volleyball team signs two high school stars

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team announced that two high school standouts have signed national letters of intent to play at K-State next fall.

Laura Downey of La Mesa, Calif., will receive a scholarship, while Jennifer Pollard of North Bend, Neb., will join the team as a walk-on.

"Last year, we recruited with the philosophy that we wanted to get more physical," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "We brought in six players and accomplished that goal."

In addition to bringing in physical players, McLaughlin said he was pleased with the skills of the players he recruited.

"For 1999, our goal was to bring up our skill level," he said. "Both of our recruits, Downey and Pollard, are very skilled volleyball players. They have played volleyball at a very high level and their skills will help balance and improve our physical ability."

Downey played a significant role in turning the Helix High School volleyball program around after a 1-21 season before she arrived by helping to improve the team's record to 14-11 the following year.

She was a three-time conference most valuable player, while earning second-team all-state honors as a sophomore and first-team all-state honors as a junior and senior.

At Ursillo, Downey's high school coach, said he believes she is the best high school prospect in Southern California.

"I've told everyone that will listen to me that I think Laura Downey is the best player in Southern California," Ursillo said. "Nobody can do the things she can do. She plays every position on the court and is the best passer I've ever seen."

McLaughlin said K-State

A touch of sports would help fix the impeachment process, especially when every other column topic fails

VIEWPOINT

NEFF

First of all, I was hoping today to write about an against-all-odds Atlanta Falcons victory in the Super Bowl against the Denver Broncos. My backup plan was to write about a victory by our Wildcats over the hated KU Jayhawks, ending the streak on Big Monday in front of a national audience.

Another contingency plan? Afraid not. If all else failed, I wanted to do coverage of the National Jump Rope Competition on ESPN2, but I didn't feel like staying up until 3 a.m. to watch people skip rope in time to "Flight of the Bumble Bee." Enter my roommate. He suggested that I make up my own sport, like Political Roller Derby.

What a brilliant idea!

Here's how it would work: The impeachment process is a long and tedious one. Nobody wants to sit through it, so how about we make it interesting and give Clinton a sporting chance. Political Roller Derby would pit the pro-impeachment congressmen against the anti-impeachment congressmen with special guest skater Bill Clinton.

Tell you what, because there are more pro-impeachment team members than anti-impeachment, Clinton even can have a few Secret Service members skating alongside to help protect him. I really don't think it'll matter, though. If Clinton's team does win, he can stay in office. If not, run him out of Washington, D.C., on a rail. Sound fair? C-Span would catch this up.

I admit, I don't know the rules to Roller Derby, only that you can hit other people while they're skating around the track trying to pass you. I guess they get points for that. Therefore, we'll just have to make up our own rules.

Rule One — No hitting below the belt. That is bad and will result in the offending government official eliminated from the contest and thrown out of office.

Rule Two — You have to throw the opposing team's players over a 5-foot, high-voltage electric fence circling the rink to eliminate them. The first team whose players are eliminated, loses.

I think that just about covers all the rules we need. Besides, rules only make sports boring. For a more in-depth look at Bill Clinton's chances of survival, I talked to the Collegian professional Roller Derby analyst, Bob.

"Well, Clinton's chances primarily depend on whether cheerleaders are present at the match," Bob said. "He really must keep his focus if he wants to win. It might not matter, though, with the entire Congress — that's approximately 440 congressmen — participating all at once. The hitting will be fast and furious, and it should draw a huge crowd. I've got 20 bucks that says Clinton doesn't escape unscathed, even with some Secret Service agents present.

"Essentially, he's screwed. On a more personal note, I'd like to see the government use Roller Derby for other stuff, like elections and such. I wouldn't mind running for a government office then. You think if they do, Jesse 'The Body' Ventura would have to be the favorite in 2002?"

Political Roller Derby, the sport of the future. Perhaps now politicians will have to earn their money.

Jewelers give tips for finding perfect ring

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For most couples, one of the more important symbols of marriage is the engagement ring. Finding the perfect ring can be a difficult decision for some, especially if they aren't sure what to look for.

"When buying a ring, people should look at clarity, cut, color, and carat-weight of the diamond," said Laurel Zimmerman, manager of Danenberg Jewelers.

The better quality cut a diamond is, the better the light will reflect and the more brilliant the stone will be, Zimmerman said.

Clarity also affects the brilliance of a diamond, she said.

"Clarity is the number of blemishes or inclusions in a stone," Zimmerman said. "The fewer the inclusions, the better the diamond is and the more expensive it will be."

She said inclusions can affect and change the path of light causing the stone's brilliance to diminish.

Color, Zimmerman said, also plays an important role in the quality of a diamond. She said diamonds are divided into different grades of color. Colorless stones are the most expensive, and there are some stones with light yellow or brown tones that are less expensive because they aren't as rare as the colorless.

Another feature that affects price is the carat-weight. A carat is a unit of weight that is divided into points. Each carat is equal to 100 points. Zimmerman said to think of it as 100 pennies to every dollar. Usually, the bigger the carat, the more expensive the stone will be.

"Keep in mind that it's not just the size of the stone affecting price," Zimmerman said, "It's everything combined."

When choosing a ring, he said it's also a good idea to keep in mind particular lifestyles.

"We have a lot of vet students or other people who wear gloves a lot. We recommend a ring that is set into the band so there are no prongs and it won't catch on anything," Zimmerman said.

Keith Steinle, manager of K's Jewelry, said picking a ring has a lot to do with preference.

"Everybody has a price and everyone has a dream in mind," Steinle said. "We find out what our customers like and we try to help them from there."

MANAGER, DANENBERG

Zimmerman said she thinks it is a good idea to shop around when buying a ring.

"I would suggest comparing prices and looking at the independent jewelers especially in a town this size," she said.

Luke Naylor, senior in wildlife biology, said he did some comparing before buying a ring.

"I took my girlfriend the first time I looked to see what she liked," said Naylor. "Then I looked around at different stores and shopped around for a price and a good quality diamond before making a decision."

Bridal wear crucial to planning

By KELLY LYNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some of the biggest decisions couples might face when planning "the big day" revolve around bridal wear. Local bridal shops offer many options for each participant of a wedding. As a general rule, most bridal wear retailers advise shoppers to start early. "You can't start early enough. You have to start a year ahead," said Pam Miller, owner of Marie's Bridal, Formal Wear and Tuxedo. "We've been really busy since January 2," Miller said. "It seems like right after Christmas, everyone gets really serious about it. Shop in the fall. You get the best deals then." For many brides, the latest trends in bridal wear influence their choices of style, color and accessories. "The styles tend to be plainer this year," Miller said. When deciding whether to wear a white or ivory wedding gown, personal preference is often the deciding factor, she said. The tone of one's skin color also might affect their choice in dress color,

Miller said. "Now people are deciding what looks good with their skin because some just don't look as good in white," she said. "It just washes them out, and ivory makes them look tanner. It just depends on what they like. They're just not doing the traditional things anymore." For bridesmaids, brides tend to be selecting more sophisticated, sleek styles, steering away from the frilly skirts, puffy shoulders, bows, lace and extremely decorated trims, Miller said. Pastels are popular this year, while floral patterns are not so commonly used, Miller said. "The colors 'in' now are pastels like sea mist, silver, ice pink and ice blue, golden, lilac and a new one — champagne, which is a shimmery beige color," Miller said. Typically, brides spend from $400 to

OWNER, MARIE'S BRIDAL, FORMAL WEAR AND TUXEDO

$800 on their wedding gown, she said. Brides also have the option to rent a gown, which can cost anywhere from $150 to $300. When choosing between brands of bridal wear, the main difference is cost, she said. "All the companies pretty much copy each other. All are similar," Miller said. Bridesmaids usually pay for their own dresses, which usually cost around $150 per dress. Groomsmen usually pay for their attire, as well. "Grooms usually pay for their own rentals, 95 percent of the time," said Michelle Howland, employee at The Tux Shop. Tuxedos typically range from $45 to $90 per rental, and include coat, pants, shirt, jacket, tie and cummerbund. A fancy vest and tie, or non-black cummerbund can add additional costs. A new tuxedo usually costs around $300. Many bridal wear stores offer discounts if the tuxedos are rented from the same store as where the wedding gown is purchased. Also, other specials exist in regard to how many tuxedos are rented. For example, it is common for many stores to rent the sixth tuxedo for free. Most stores have samples of gowns and dresses to try on prior to being ordered. When business slows down in the fall, many stores offer discounts if the wedding gown is bought directly off the rack. Bridal accessories, such as bras, slips, headpieces, veils, jewelry and shoes are also available. Headpieces and veils can cost anywhere from $150 to $200 and are typically ordered through the mail. It usually takes about two months for delivery. A new trend in how brides wear their hair is a "bun-wrap," which allows the hair to be pulled through the headpiece, which also has a veil attached. Stores typically offer dyeable shoes whether they can dye them there in the store or not. Dyeing shoes is sometimes free, or it can cost around $10 per pair to be dyed elsewhere.

Ron Sampson (left), president of the Mid-America Commercialization Corp., speaks Thursday morning during a press conference announcing a new alliance between Ford Motor Co. and K-State. K-State to benefit from Ford Motor Co. technology

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Recycling isn't all about aluminum cans and newspapers.

Ford Motor Co. is recycling by donating patented technologies it no longer uses to K-State and the Mid-America Commercialization Corp.

"Rather than having technology languish, we wanted somebody to take advantage of this," Jennifer Flake, Ford spokeswoman, said. "We chose K-State because it has a very impressive track with MACC, and it's appealing the research and development was used for educational purposes."

MACC, a non-profit organization, was co-founded by K-State, along with other Manhattan enterprises. Ron Sampson, MACC president and K-State professor of technology and management, said MACC was created to meet a need.

"We facilitate corporate technology and fill some gaps in the marketplace," he said. "We want to return the benefits to the Manhattan community in particular."

The patents inside the multimillion-dollar portfolio are divided into two categories. The first is four-wheel steering systems, which can be used for airport tugs, tractors and forklifts. Henry Fradkin, Ford Global Technologies Inc. director, said Ford never used this patent because other companies had marketed this idea, and it had been unsuccessful.

"We're in an age now where we can't let ideas lie fallow," he said.

The other category is protection from electrostatic discharge, which can be used to develop protection systems for microchips in computers.

Ron Trewyn, K-State Research Foundation president, said building relationships with the private sector is something many universities and communities are considering.

"We have the opportunity to add value to these Ford technologies and build on them," Trewyn said.

Fradkin said Ford had technologies with no strategic value for them, so they would not use the asset and just let the patents expire. This is the first time K-State has received Ford patents, although it has received patents from other institutions.

"Growing the state of Kansas, growing Manhattan, creating jobs and creating wealth: This is what MACC is all about," Pat Connelly, founding MACC director, said.

New system to improve airport safety, reliability

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A satellite-based system that directs airplane pilots and their passengers more safely and accurately to their destinations soon will be in place at Manhattan Regional Airport.

The city's request for global positioning satellite approaches to the airport was approved recently by the Federal Aviation Administration. Within the next 18 months, Manhattan will have state-of-the-art instrumentation approach procedures for airplanes and will be well positioned for further upgrades in technology by the FAA, Airport Director Ken Black said.

"The system provides great flexibility for arriving aircraft during inclement weather or at night to help direct them for a safe landing," Black said.

GPS uses longitudinal and lateral positioning to tell pilots exactly where they are. GPS tracks a straight line from the aircraft to the airport to give the pilot accurate positioning.

GPS allows pilots to track the exact location of the runway by the use of satellites. It gives pilots a secondary system for approaches and landings, using instrumentation that doesn't need ground components.

"You get signals from satellites to tell you where you are," FAA engineer Kirk Price said. "It updates the pilot very quickly on where he is."

GPS navigational equipment is installed within aircraft that have been certified by the FAA, so pilots with GPS in their airplanes will have more alternatives when landing at Manhattan's airport, Black said.

"What we applied for is to write instrument approach procedures based on GPS systems," Black said. "We install nothing."

The instrument approach procedures are a landmark for the airport without a visual of the runway, Black said.

A variety of airplanes land at the airport's four runways daily, from 737 jets to small Cessnas, City Manager Gary Greer said.

"For those with the navigational equipment, it'll be really helpful," Greer said.

Greer said most of the planes that fly into the airport have GPS installed.

"Most planes that carry more than a few people have the equipment," Greer said.

The new approach system will cost the airport nothing, Black said. The FAA's annual budget provides for the cost of writing out the approaches.

"We're doing this to make the airplane safer and to stimulate traffic," Black said.

Black said the GPS approaches should improve the traffic count by making the airport more appealing to the aviation business. Passengers could experience more on-time scheduling once GPS is in use at the airport. There also will be fewer flight delays and cancellations, Greer said.

"It's a positive addition to the airport and to the city of Manhattan," Greer said.

The airport has several landing systems, but they have been around for a while, Black said. The airport has sought additional approach procedures for a while.

Airports worldwide have upgraded to GPS for safety and increased reliability.

"It makes me feel much more comfortable in a plane," said Black, who is also a pilot.

The satellites that transmit signals to aircraft are operated by the Department of Defense, Black said. The military uses GPS in its operations.

"This is the same system that guides missiles to their target," Black said.

The Department of Defense applies a filter to GPS for commercial applications, Black said. It does this for safety and protection.

"Our enemies are using it," Black said.

Commercial GPS approaches aren't as perfectly accurate as those used by the military, Black said. This is because missile guidance must be accurate within inches of the target.

"If I'm guiding a missile to my target, I'd like to be right on target," Black said. "At an airport, I can afford to be a foot or two off."

GPS equipment is becoming popular and affordable for anyone to purchase.

Rick Teaford, assistant manager at Radio Shack-Associate, said hand-held GPS devices have become popular for hiking and other outdoor activities to help people find their way around.

The hand-held devices come in a variety of sizes depending on the user's needs. They can be carried along in cars, boats and personal airplanes. The cost of the devices ranges from $120 to $550, Teaford said.

King Hussein returns home after failed cancer treatment in U.S.

By JAMAL HALABY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMMAN, Jordan — A gravely ill King Hussein left a U.S. hospital Thursday after an unsuccessful bone marrow transplant and flew back to Jordan, accompanied by his wife and family members.

The king's trip home came only 10 days after he had abruptly traveled to the United States seeking care for a relapse of lymphatic cancer.

The condition of the 63-year-old Hussein "has become critical due to the failure of the function of internal organs," the king's private physician, Lt. Gen. Samir Farraj, said Thursday.

Farraj's statement, issued at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., gave no further details on the king's health, but an official in Amman said Hussein's body apparently had rejected a bone marrow transplant performed on Tuesday.

On Thursday, Hussein left the clinic where he has been receiving treatment for recurrence of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma cancer since Jan. 26. His plane took off Thursday afternoon.

In Amman, a royal palace statement read over the state-run Jordan Television said: "Upon King Hussein's persistent wish, he will return home tomorrow morning" — today.

Just before leaving for America, the king named his oldest son as his successor in an apparent move to ensure Jordan's future stability.

Hussein is the Middle East's longest ruling monarch; he has been on the throne 46 years. He is known as a force for moderation in the volatile Middle East and, after Jordan's 1994 peace with Israel, he has pushed for a broader regional peace.

In Washington, D.C., President Clinton urged prayers for the king who had helped forge the Wye River peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians in October.

"I ask you to pray for our King Hussein, a wonderful human being, a champion of peace who, I promise you, today is fighting for his life mostly so he can continue to fight for peace," Clinton said.

Marshall Scholars honored by president at luncheon

By PAM LEWIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President Jon Wefald honored Marshall Scholarship recipients Tim Riemann and Sam Halabi with a luncheon Thursday in the K-State Student Union Flint Hills Room.

"This is why we do this today, because this is the equivalent of a student Super Bowl," Wefald said. "It is virtually impossible to get a Rhodes Scholarship winner or a Marshall Scholarship winner on the front page of The Kansas City Star, The Wichita Eagle, or any other paper. If you were an All-America football or basketball player, you would be on the front page three or four days in a row."

Wefald spoke in front of a group of K-State academic representatives, alumni, students and invited guests of Riemann and Halabi.

He said student scholars and the university are not receiving the recognition they deserve.

Most people measure success the same way The Associated Press measures athletic teams — by rankings, Wefald said. He used top-10 charts to illustrate that K-State is among the best in the nation in scholarship winners.

K-State competes against colleges that require a 30 or higher on the American College Testing Program for admission, a requirement met by 12 to 15 percent of K-State students. K-State

Riemann, Halabi thankful for scholarships, assistance with applications has had 10 Marshall Scholarship winners, six Rhodes, 23 Trumans and 34 Goldwaters.

Beth Powers, national scholarship adviser for K-State, has acted as the invisible hand behind the winners.

She prepared Riemann and Halabi for their interviews in Chicago, where they impressed the selection committee that debated for them in Washington, D.C., and awarded them the scholarships.

Powers said it was their dedication, determination and leadership that earned them the Marshalls.

"The scholarship requires a 3.7 or higher grade point average," Powers said. "These guys are not just outstanding students. They are involved on and off campus. They have excellent communication skills, and they want to make a difference in their fields."

Halabi is majoring in political science and natural resources and environmental science. He is a member of several environmental organizations and works for a natural resources district. He wants to become an expert in the Middle East.

"I feel like I am receiving a lot of undeserved attention," Halabi said. "I would be the first to say that the faculty members are underpaid, and I would be a criminal not to mention the efforts of Beth Powers."

Halabi's advice to potential Marshall Scholarship applicants and students is to become familiar with professors.

"They make themselves open to everyone," he said.

Riemann said he agreed with Halabi about the importance of faculty in his academic success.

"They make you sound much smarter. I am just a nice guy who slides in on his coat tail," Riemann said. "It would have been impossible without the faculty's help, and Beth is a constant tutor."

Riemann is majoring in agricultural economics, political science and pre-law. He is a former student body president and a Truman Scholarship winner.

As a result of the scholarship, both students will attend Oxford University. Halabi will continue his studies in political science, and Riemann will focus on African politics.

"I will be following Sam to Oxford," Riemann said. "Thanks to Beth, we are going to take our money and run."

New confession could save death-row inmate

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — A man confessed this week to killing a teen-age couple in 1982 — a crime for which another man came within two days of being executed last fall.

A videotaped confession was made Wednesday to a private investigator working with Northwestern University journalism professor David Protess and his class. In it, Alstory Simon, a Milwaukee laborer who used to live in Chicago, said he killed Jerry Hillard, 18, and Marilyn Green, 19, in Chicago's Washington Park on Aug. 15, 1982.

Protess made headlines two years ago when another group of his students cleared four men in a different killing. On Wednesday, he and his current class turned the new tape over to the Cook County state attorney's office.

"We are reviewing it and will conduct our own full investigation," state attorney spokesman Bob Benjamin said.

Anthony Porter, now 43, was convicted of the killings and was two days away from death when his scheduled September execution was delayed because of questions about his mental condition and IQ. Porter's appeal is pending.

Porter, sitting in the visiting room at Cook County Jail, banged his handcuffed fists against his forehead Wednesday when he was told of the videotaped statement, The Chicago Tribune reported.

"Oh, my God. Thank you, God," he said as he began to weep. "I'm just overwhelmed. I've been trying to fight for my life for so long."

In the videotape, broadcast on Chicago TV stations, Simon said he felt threatened during a confrontation over drug money and was protecting himself and his wife when the shooting occurred. He fired his gun, he said, because he thought Hillard was going for a gun in his coat. He said he didn't mean to shoot Green.

"Before I knew anything, I just pulled it up and started shooting," he said during the 10-minute statement, taped in his Milwaukee apartment. "I must have close to busted off about six rounds."

Also this week, Protess and his students submitted two affidavits in Porter's case. In one, a key witness against Porter recanted his testimony, saying it was coerced by police. The other affidavit was from an Illinois prison inmate who said Simon confessed that he committed the killings.

Porter's attorney, Daniel Sanders, said he will seek to have Porter's conviction vacated and his client freed.

If Porter is exonerated, he will be the 10th death row prisoner in Illinois released since the state reinstated capital punishment in 1977.

In 1997, Protess and another group of students were instrumental in freeing four men wrongfully convicted in a 1978 gang rape and double murder in suburban Ford Heights.

BSU to celebrate anniversary

By CRISTY ANDERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students and alumni will remember the Black Student Union's legacy during 30th anniversary activities Saturday. Lodi Rodes, a founding BSU member, will speak at the continuing excellence banquet at 6 p.m. in the Union Ballroom.

"I expect him to speak directly to young people about relationship-building, a component of being successful in a college setting," said Diana Caldwell, assistant director of constituent programs at the KSU Alumni Association.

BSU members are aware of the importance of relationships, and they credit BSU's success to the students and relationships in the organization.

"I believe what has made BSU a great organization is the great students we have at K-State," Brandon Clark, BSU president, said. "Other schools don't have the family atmosphere like we do. We are very close."

Erika Cannon, BSU executive member, said the university would be much different without the BSU's presence.

"The students keep us going. Without them, there is no BSU," she said. "We're here to make sure that they feel comfortable and that they are having fun."

BSU is a home for black students on a predominantly white campus, Caldwell said. She said the organization has overcome many challenges in the past 30 years.

"BSU is responsible for many of the positive changes at K-State," she said. "They have become a greater voice on campus. They have caused the university community to look at the unmet needs and concerns of minority students."

BSU has served as a proving ground for black student government. Rodes is one of the leaders from the 1970s who has contributed to BSU and made a difference, Caldwell said. She said she also is eager to hear him speak.

"Hearing him tell us stories of how BSU was started is a reassurance to keep going, even when the situations are hard," Cannon said.

BSU leaders said they have many goals to keep the organization strong at K-State.

"The goals for BSU in the future are to become a stronger organization as far as numbers, increase minority enrollment at K-State, increase our political involvement on campus, and increase our involvement in campus activities, like Homecoming, as well as other activities in the community," Clark said.

In addition to the banquet, other activities are planned Saturday for students and alumni. For students, there will be a Minority Scholarship Workshop at 10 a.m. in Union 205. For alumni, there will be a Black Alumni Reunion Planning Meeting at 11 a.m. at Java Espresso & Bakery in Aggieville. A BSU founders meeting is planned for students and alumni to meet and discuss the past and future of BSU, at 4 p.m. in Union 212.

said she is thankful for the support she received from her family.

"When I accepted myself as a lesbian my world didn't fall apart," she said. "It fell together."

When Newt Gingrich learned of his sister's sexual preference in 1987, he told her it was her life and she had every right to live it as she wanted.

After coming out, Gingrich said she did not know there was a need for activists. She had never been treated unfairly because of her sexual orientation, so she assumed it never happened to anyone.

"I was in a state of blissful ignorance for several years," she said. "Most of us are not activists. We're reactives. It takes something to spur or spark us."

Gingrich said education is the key in preventing ignorance.

"I like to give people the benefit of the doubt. I would rather think people are ignorant than they just hate people," she said. "Maybe it keeps me sane. It helps me from being too bitter."

More efforts need to be taken in the school setting to spread understanding and awareness, Gingrich said.

"We're not talking about promoting or teaching homosexuality," she said. "We're talking about creating a safe environment where students can grow and learn."

"To the people who feel like we shouldn't address such issues in school, the price we pay for silence could be the lives of youths," she said.

At the presentation, Manhattan City Commissioner Karen McCulloh said she would consider a non-discrimination policy that included sexual orientation for the city if it was presented by members of the community. She encouraged people to write to the commission and present the idea. Manhattan currently has a non-harassment clause that includes sexual orientation.

Anja Clasberg, junior in secondary education, said she attended the speech because she was interested in Candace Gingrich became involved with the movement for equal rights when her brother Newt Gingrich was elected speaker of the House in 1994. what Gingrich could teach the K-State community.

"As a lesbian, I wanted to hear what Candace has to say on these issues pertaining to us," she said. "It's pretty important to have a person like this at K-State. She could really help increase awareness here."

Everyone who believes in equality needs to be aware of the discrimination that exists against homosexuals, Gingrich said.

"We need to come out together," she said. "If you're not a gay person but you believe in fairness, you need to come out, too."

dealing with even now."

Joe Pauk, junior in architecture, was one of Muck's roommates and was first to speak.

"The first experience that showed me what kind of guy he was was when we were all sitting around talking and I realized I was living with a bunch of hicks," Pauk said, to which the crowd responded with laughter. "He knew everything there ever was to know about hunting, and he was also one of the best cooks I ever met. I don't think I've ever felt that at home with someone."

Stephanie Roach, sophomore in apparel, marketing and design, Muck's fiancée, spoke about their relationship and her first memories of him. The couple had been dating for more than five years and were engaged for two years.

"The first time I realized I liked him was when I was in the fifth grade, and he was in sixth grade and he saved me from my older brother almost running me over with a three-wheeler," she said. "We knew right off the bat that we were supposed to be together. We loved each other, and everybody knew it."

Roach also thanked everyone for the support they have provided since the accident. She expressed how difficult the transition would be without her fiancée, but she has returned to school.

"I'm starting over, and it's hard when you've known someone for so long. I've loved him since the fifth grade, and I will love him until the day I die. He just won't be here with me," she said.

Several friends shared their stories of Muck's escapades with potato guns and eggs. The group laughed as classmates recounted tales of the home economics class they were in and his pet snake Emma. Another friend told of how he loved the "Puff, the Magic Dragon" song.

The laughter was replaced by tears as Duane Muck thanked everyone for attending the service in memory of his son.

"Don't stop coming to see us," he said. "You guys are all we've got left."

Fallon closed the service with some final thoughts of encouragement.

"It is hard to lose a child because it is so unnatural and you never expect that to happen," he said. "God's promise is not that he will take away all of our pain, but that he will walk with us through it all."

Fallon said it is important to remember what Muck would want.

"I hope that we can go today and realize that all through the pain and hurt and joy, we can grow as Christians would want us to," he said. "He would want us to bring healing and hope to others and to become more compassionate and loving people."

The group then joined hands as everyone took a moment of silence in memory of Muck.

After the service, Duane Muck stood in front of a picture of himself with his son.

"He was happy and that's all that mattered," he said.

things and go in there and run offense, which involves the whole team. Everyone has to do their part in order to win the game."

Both the coach and players said defense and rebounding must improve.

"If we want to have a chance to beat Colorado, our post players must step up and rebound," Patterson said. "If we do not win the war on the boards, we will not put ourselves in the position of winning in Colorado."

while leading her team to a 26-2 record and a second-place state finish for the second season in a row after going 26-1 her junior season.

"Jenny is a very good passer," McLaughlin said. "She can serve and receive serves at a very high level. The best thing about her is the way she plays the game."

"She has good balance and understands the game at a pretty good level," he said.

"She will need to become more physical and get used to playing at a faster speed," McLaughlin said.

Colorado boasts a strong inside lineup, which will be another area of focus for the Cats. Patterson said this, combined with the perimeter game, makes the Buffaloes a threatening team.

will attempt to mold Downey into a setter for the Cats because it's a position that she can excel at here.

"We plan to develop Laura as a setter," he said.

"She can go further in this game as a setter and become an elite player at that position."

"I like the way she moves, the way she sees the game and her court presence. She becomes, perhaps, the most skilled volleyball player on our team."

Looking to shut down Colorado's front line are K-State post players Angie Finkes, Nicky Ramage and Olga Firsova. Patterson said these players are K-State's advantages over Colorado.

Ramage said while she will play a role in the game, team elements will be the key to success.

"You go every day game by game, and every game is a new challenge," Ramage said. "Every game when you go out you have to rebound and do certain House lawyers will have up to three hours each to make presentations including portions of videotaped depositions on Saturday. In addition to Lewinsky, lawyers questioned presidential friend Vernon Jordan and White House aide Sidney Blumenthal earlier this week and recorded the proceedings.

An effort by the House prosecutors to call Lewinsky for live questioning was rejected, 70-30, with 25 of the Senate's 55 Republicans joining the 45 Democrats in opposition.

Judy Smith, a spokeswoman for Lewinsky, said the former White House intern "and her family are pleased that she does not have to go through the painful and humiliating ordeal of having to testify on the floor of the Senate."

The vote against calling Lewinsky was a rebuff to Rep. Henry Hyde and other House prosecutors who had pushed the two articles of impeachment through the House on a near party-line vote.

They won grudging Senate permission a week ago to depose the three witnesses, but only after paring their list down from a dozen or more.

A subsequent bid by Democratic Sen. Patty Murray to keep the videotapes out of presentations at the trial failed.

The vote was 73-27, with 20 Democrats joining 53 Republicans.

That left Republican prosecutors — and White House defenders — free to use segments of the taped depositions on Saturday.

Taken together, the day's votes underscored that senators in both parties are eager for a swift conclusion to the trial, near the end of its fourth week. Republicans, in particular, have been laboring to find an exit from a proceeding that is unpopular with the public and that GOP strategists say is inflicting political damage on the party.

Fee committee rejects library privilege fee proposal

By MIKE WATSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A proposed $1.70 student privilege fee for Hale Library failed Sunday in the Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock's original proposal, brought before the committee two weeks ago, would have generated $685,431 per year for the library. The committee didn't pass that measure at the time.

This week a new proposal — the result of a compromise between Hobrock and Privilege Fee Committee — was introduced. The new bill called for a three-year fee that would have started at $360,000 and risen each year by 8 percent for inflation.

Another of Hobrock's proposals asked only for a 2.5 percent inflationary increase per year.

Both failed.

As a result, Privilege Fee Committee will not be sponsoring a library funding bill before Student Senate.

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Jeff Meder said although the committee is not supporting the bill, Hobrock can still present it to Senate.

After a first reading in Senate, any fee bill would return to the committee for review. The fee committee could pass the bill back to Senate with a favorable or unfavorable recommendation, or members could choose to hold the bill in committee.

Meder said it's a good assumption that if the bill returns to the committee, it will receive an unfavorable recommendation or receive no recommendation, effectively locking the bill in committee and preventing its ratification by Senate.

College of Business Senator Nick Muegling said he felt library funding should be a separate entity from privilege fees because it's not unique.

"I think that privilege fees are above and beyond," Muegling said. "Every institution has a library, but not every institution has our health-care services or a recreation center."

By definition, a library is not above and beyond."

Hobrock said the reason for more debate on the library fee after its failure in Senate last year is due to a change in the KSU Foundation's estimated level of support for the library, he said.

"I overestimated the progress of funds after consultation with the Foundation," Hobrock said.

Due to inflationary costs, Hobrock said the proposed $1.70 fee isn't sufficient to maintain the level that KSU Libraries seeks. K-State ranks last in the Big 12 Conference in regard to libraries, $4 million behind number 11 in the conference.

KSDB-FM 91.9 took a newly amended bill before the Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee Sunday night asking for more funding. The new bill also included an amendment added by Jeremy Claeys, KSDB program director, which would attach student-control stipulations to the funding.

In the meeting, the committee passed a motion to allocate $42,783 out of reserve accounts to cover the debt KSDB has incurred. The amount to cover its deficit is a one-time

Jordan mourns loss of beloved King Hussein

By JAMAL HALABY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMMAN, Jordan — Jordan crowned an untested new monarch Sunday and plunged into mourning for its beloved King Hussein.

Distraught citizens sobbed in the streets and world leaders converged on the desert kingdom, united in grief for the statesman who brought bridges of peace to the turbulent Middle East.

The deep political divides between those planning to attend today's elaborate state funeral served as a powerful reminder of Hussein's far-reaching abilities as a mediator and leader — skills that lifted Jordan into a place of international prominence.

"Even the sky is crying," an announcer on Jordanian television declared as a rare, dripping fog shrouded the city after the king died at 11:43 a.m. (3:43 a.m. CST) from cancer.

Black flags fluttered from the few taxicabs plying the streets. The wail of Koranic verses of mourning filled the country's mosques and residents wept on the sidewalks of Amman, Jordan's hilly capital.

Hussein, who had fought a seven-month battle with lymphatic cancer, had lingered unconscious on a respirator for two days after returning home to Jordan last week to die.

Courtiers, Jordanian officials and members of the royal family, including his dozen children and his wife, the American-born Queen

Survey asks students for Lafene viewpoints

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students will get a chance to voice their opinions about the funding of Lafene Health Center, a survey is to be mailed out Friday.

The survey was developed by Lafene directors, the Office of Institutional Advancement, Student Health Advisory Committee and the Student Government Association and will be mailed to 1,000 K-State students.

The creators of the survey have taken factors such as age and number of credit hours as well as other differences within the student body into consideration to ensure accuracy, said Barbara Dethloff, SHAC public relations chairwoman.

Funding will be the most important topic on the survey, but other issues such as health care, a need for new services and the possible move off campus also will be included, Dethloff said.

Students who do not receive the mailed survey can fill out identical surveys at the K-State Student Union. They will be available around Feb. 18.

"We want this to be accessible to everyone," Dethloff said. "We want to find out what students want — that's what this survey is geared at discovering."

Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said this look at health-center funding is just in time.

"Costs keep going up, and the money we are getting from student privilege fees is not keeping up," he said. "We are operating at a loss around $250,000 a year now, and we've been running off reserve the last few years. There's no way we can continue to do that after this

HOPE FOR NATIONAL REIGN FADES

After a rehearsal, Monty Beisel greets his girlfriend Amanda Carraway in the lobby of her hotel in Branson, Mo. Carraway was guarded 24 hours a day by pageant security and was allowed to see family and friends only briefly.

— AMANDA CARRAWAY

The announcement of the 10th finalist ended any hope of becoming Miss USA for 41 women Saturday night. Amanda Carraway, Miss Kansas USA and a junior in public relations, was one of them.

Carraway was eliminated from competition when the field of 51 contestants narrowed to 10 finalists at the 48th Miss USA Pageant, at the Grand Palace in Branson, Mo.

As Shemar Moore, pageant host, announced the finalists, Carraway said she suspected she had not made the cut.

"You can usually tell by the third name because there's kind of a pattern," she said. "I started to get a feeling, and I looked out at my family and thought, 'Well, it's not my night.'"

Duke Myers, Carraway's grandfather, said he had the same feeling and was surprised by the judges' choices.

"We've been here all week, and the girls we had picked and Mandy had picked were totally different from the finalists," he said. "The judges only see the girls for a few minutes, and they don't really get to know them in that time."

The 10 finalists went on to compete in the rapid-fire interview, swimsuit and evening-gown categories. The panel of eight judges chose Miss Tennessee USA, Miss New York USA and Miss California USA for the final interview.

Miss New York USA, Kimberly Ann Pressler, was crowned Miss USA 1999.

Although Carraway said she didn't feel nervous during the competition, Christa Quinn, Carraway's former roommate and a senior in accounting and marketing, said being in the audience was stressful.

"It was hard sitting there and not knowing what would happen," she said. "I just kept hoping that her name would be the next one called."

Carraway said the judges wanted a diverse panel for the final competition. She said the qualities of other candidates could affect a selection as much as the candidate's qualities.

"It's so subjective, and you never know what the judges are going to look for," she said.

"Everyone thinks blonde-haired, blue-eyed girls will automatically do well. Sometimes they do, but usually they don't."

After the announcement of the finalists, Carraway said she talked with other contestants backstage.

"A lot of the girls were really upset and were crying backstage," she said. "I just got out a little bag of cookies that I had, and some of us sat back there and talked until we had to go back onstage."

Myers said Carraway handled the disappointment well, and her family was proud of her.

"As far as we're concerned, she's a winner and always will be," he said.

Carraway said she will continue to fulfill her duties as Miss Kansas USA, but she also wants to pursue acting and modeling.

"I have a feeling that there is something bigger and better waiting," she said. "I just need to find it."

Nebraska battles binge drinking with five-year grant

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LINCOLN, Neb. — Nebraska's largest college campus, University of Nebraska-Lincoln, has an alcohol problem, particularly binge drinking among its students, school officials said.

"It's a huge problem," Jim Griesen, vice chancellor for student affairs at Nebraska, said. "Most of the bad things that happen to college students happen because of high-risk drinking."

Nebraska administrators say most sexual assaults, fights and property damage by students involve drinking.

Undeniably, it's a combustible mix.

One week ago, Nebraska sophomore Kara Bliven leaned out a window of the Chi Phi fraternity house to vomit and fell three stories, breaking an arm and ribs.

In 1993, freshman Jeffrey Knoll was severely injured when he fell from the third-floor window of the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity in a hazing incident.

In tackling the problem, Nebraska is using a $700,000, five-year grant to reduce excessive drinking, develop stricter policies and forge partnerships with police and bar owners.

"It is not going to be an easy thing to figure out," Bob Jergensen, owner of P.O. Pears bar, said.

Heavy drinking dramatically increased among college students from 1993 to 1997, according to a survey by the Harvard University School of Public Health.

The survey of 14,251 college students indicated that 52 percent "drank to get drunk" in 1997, compared with 39 percent in 1993, the first year of the study.

About 50 percent of Nebraska students identified themselves as binge drinkers in the survey, compared with 42.7 percent nationwide.

Binge drinking was defined as consuming at least five drinks in a row by males and at least four drinks in a row by females.

"Students go out with the expectation of getting drunk," Griesen said. "That's what scares us about the culture."

Many Nebraska students, however, do not see a problem.

"For every one person that's stupid about it, there's 100 that aren't," said Nebraska freshman Steve Mattern of Omaha, Neb. "You only hear about the bad stuff."

Nebraska freshman Katie Hart of Omaha, Neb. said she does not feel pressured to drink.

"A lot of students think it's something they want to try, but it costs a lot of money and there's no real reward to it," she said. "Some find that out quicker than others."

Sophomore Andy Graham of Omaha, Neb. said fraternities teach students to be responsible drinkers.

"Everyone in the house is looking out for you," he said. "In the dorms you're on your own."

The university's residence halls have taken a hard-line stance, clamping

Honor society seeks funds to support crisis center

One K-State group has a way for students to show they care without using the traditional, "roses are red, violets are blue."

Phi Upsilon Omicron, a human ecology honor society, is hoping to raise $10,000 for the K-State Women's Center and the Crisis Center Inc.

Phi Upsilon Omicron President Leslie Niles, junior in public health and nutrition, said the group set high goals for the project but she thinks they are attainable.

"We know it's a lot to bring on the first time we have a fund-raiser, but this is an important issue and we hope people will take the initiative to donate," she said.

The society will have tables set up from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. on the first floor of the K-State Student Union and the lobby of Justin Hall every day this week. Students are asked to donate a dollar to the cause. The project, "Heal the Hurt," is designed to raise awareness to the problems of domestic violence.

Rebecca Lorsch, junior in hotel and restaurant management and Phi Upsilon Omicron corresponding secretary, said she thinks awareness is important and people lack the knowledge of domestic violence.

"Some people are too afraid and don't know what to do," she said. "If you know someone who is involved with domestic violence, you need to get them out of it."

The fund-raising idea evolved from a lecture and discussion with Susan Allen, director of the women's center.

"I had no idea we would end up benefiting from this," Allen said.

Half of the money raised will be given to the campus women's center and will be used to purchase additional information on domestic violence, to bring in lecturers and to help start training programs for students who can educate their peers.

"There are a lot of freshmen on campus, and I want to reach them before they get in trouble," Allen said. "Date rape happens and it happens here."

77-year-old newlywed dies after being beaten with bat

LEAWOOD, Kan. — Less than three months after marrying his high school sweetheart, 77-year-old Lawrence Kubik died Saturday after the couple were severely beaten at home with a baseball bat.

The suspect, a 79-year-old man who had befriended Kubik's wife, has been in jail since Friday on attempted murder and burglary charges.

Francis Patrick Doyle denies any wrongdoing, his lawyer, James Anderson, said Saturday. However, he said he expected a first-degree murder charge to be filed against Doyle in light of Kubik's death.

Kubik and his wife, Marguerite Bacher-Kubik, who were married on Nov. 16, were attacked early Thursday in their home in Leawood, a quiet, affluent suburb of Kansas City, Mo.

Doyle, of nearby Prairie Village, is accused of using a key to enter the house and beating Kubik in a bedroom, where he was apparently sleeping. Bacher-Kubik was able to call 911 from a bathroom telephone before she was attacked.

When police arrived, they found Doyle holding a bat inside the couple's home.

Kubik died early Saturday at St. Joseph Health Center, spokeswoman Rhonda Dawkins said. Bacher-Kubik, 77, was in a separate hospital Saturday. Her condition had been upgraded from critical to serious.

Anderson said he had not spoken with Doyle since learning of Kubik's death. He described Doyle as "very concerned and very considerate" about the couple's condition.

"I know that Mr. Doyle would never wish any harm to anyone," Anderson said. "I know that he is sorry that anything ever happened to Mr. Kubik. He has denied any wrongdoing."

Doyle on Friday waived formal reading of the charges against him and was returned to the Johnson County Adult Detention Center on $500,000 bond. His next court appearance is scheduled for Thursday.

Clinton asserts right to use bombs to thwart terrorism

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Clinton administration now asserts the right to bomb government facilities in nations that provide sanctuary to international terrorists, a significant escalation of U.S. attempts to thwart terrorism.

"We may not just go in a strike against a terrorist facility — we may choose to retaliate against the facilities of the host country, if that host country is a knowing, cooperative sanctuary," Richard Clarke, President Clinton's coordinator for counterterrorism, told The Associated Press.

In an interview last week, Clarke described the policy that marks a departure from the tactics employed last August when U.S. cruise missiles struck at alleged terrorist strongholds in Afghanistan and Sudan.

Now the administration contends it could broaden such an attack to include government buildings and assets in nations that knowingly harbor terrorists.

The Clinton administration repeatedly has warned nations that protect terrorist groups.

"Countries that persistently host terrorists have no right to be safe havens," Clinton told the nation Aug. 20, the day the United States launched scores of cruise missiles at suspected terrorist targets in Afghanistan and Sudan.

Lawmakers speak at Saturday forum

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local state legislators expressed their interest in working to improve faculty salaries and library funding at the monthly Sunrise Legislative Forum on Saturday.

The forum, organized by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce Public Affairs Committee, meets the first Saturday of every month during the legislative session.

House Majority Leader Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said the House's first priority is to protect the pool that Gov. Bill Graves created for faculty salary enhancements.

"We feel really good about our prospects for keeping that," he said. Graves proposed an increase of faculty salaries by about 1.2 percent.

The House is going to work hard on getting closer to the Kansas Board of Regents and K-State's request, but Glasscock said it's probably not going to get there.

Glasscock said he also feels positive about keeping the 2 percent of the budget dedicated to Other Operating Expenditures and the .5 percent dedicated to regents university's libraries.

Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, said he's sure the funding will pass.

"Although we may not be able to meet the regents' request," he said. "Our goal is to get a 5-percent increase for faculty salaries."

Peterson said that if the House met the regents' request, it would be an added $15 million to the budget.

Another issue legislators addressed was food sales tax cuts passed by the House and sent to Senate last week. The bill would totally eliminate the sales tax on food. Spanning a period of four years, the state tax would be lowered to 4.9 percent to 0 percent.

Sen. Janice Hardenburger, R-Haddam, said she wasn't happy with the cut.

"We tend to do things on the spur of the moment," she said. "Cutting the food sales tax is somewhat like a reckless father who comes home and says 'I have just quit my job. I'm not going to work this year, and we'll just do without a few things. This family will have to decide what they will have to deal without.'"

Hardenburger said everyone wanted to cut taxes. But, she said, when taxes are cut, services and programs are going to be cut.

"If we start cutting taxes, who's going to pay for these services?" she asked.

Hardenburger said Kansas legislators need to use common sense to build a tax policy.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she did not like how the food sales tax cut got passed.

She said the bill should have went through the committee process, but it didn't.

"Out of nowhere, the food sales tax, without hearings, without public comment, came to the floor, was debated and passed," Oleen said.

After it was passed, it was found that the bill did not do what the 86 people who voted for it thought it did.

"You can catch those things in committee process," she said.

Sen. Edward Pugh said he believes in the food sales tax cut, and that he felt spending would not be cut as long as there was money to spend.

A food sales tax cut would affect everyone in the state, Pugh said.

"Everybody would get a benefit, and it would be a redistribution of the money back to the folks," he said.

The legislators also updated the public on the recent proposal for Transportation 2000.

The House chair and vice chair of the Transportation Committee released a new proposal last week that doesn't have tax increases or additional bonding and is funded out of current resources and anticipated future resources, Glasscock said.

"The proposal would save hundreds of millions of dollars for the life of the plan," he said.

The total savings would be about $2.2 billion over the next 20 to 25 years, Glasscock said.

"If we were to do that, then we could, in effect, keep the transportation plan alive way past the eight-year cycle we are currently talking about," he said.

Rep. Vern Osborne, R-St. George, said he wants to stress needs rather than wants in the transportation plan.

"We need to earmark the needs of our state and not put in projects that are good for a political reason," he said.

Big brothers, sisters go bowling for fund raiser

By MIKE WATSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Big and little brothers and sisters put on their bowling shoes as the Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. had its 17th-annual Bowl for Kids' Sake. Memory Lanes and K-State Union Lanes were hosts of the event for the weekend.

The Big Brothers-Big Sisters Bowl invited everyone to bowl and eat for free. Big Brothers-Big Sisters Executive Director Tami Carolan said. The cost of admission was a sponsor sheet with minimum pledges of $50.

The goal for the event is $40,000, Carolan said. All donations received from the event will stay in the Manhattan community.

The event was for anyone willing to put in time and effort to raise money for the cause. With the open invitation, Big Brothers-Big Sisters hoped to have a good turnout, she said.

"The estimated crowd for the two days is about 560 bowlers," Carolan said. "There were about 400 people at Memory Lanes, and we anticipated 160 bowlers between two sessions today."

Not only was the event for the community, but league bowlers also were involved in the event.

"League bowlers are participating in their usual league," Carolan said. "We encouraged them to take a sponsor sheet and try to collect money throughout the week."

Many of the big brothers and sisters who have set aside time to fill a void in the lives of young children are K-State students.

"About 85 percent of Big Brothers-Big Sisters are K-State students," she said.

Jill Shanteau, junior in life science, was paired with her little sister Allison about two months ago.

"I love working with kids," Shanteau said. "I like the satisfaction I get when she smiles or accomplishes something new."

Shanteau said she enjoys spending time with Allison and that the program isn't hard and doesn't take much time.

"This is the first group event we have been to together," she said. "I'll be seeing her every Monday and Wednesday for about two hours a day. The hardest part about it is seeing some of the struggles that kids face today. It opens your eyes up to what kids are facing."

Due to a lack in male volunteers, there is a list of boys who haven't been paired up yet.

"We need male volunteers really bad," Carolan said. "We have 40 boys that are waiting to be matched up with a big brother."

To become a part of Big Brothers-Big Sisters, a prospective big brother or sister must apply and go through a screening process. For those who feel it will be too time consuming, two volunteers can be matched up with one little brother or sister and share time.

Station should stay in students' hands

The irony of KSDB-FM 91.9 becoming a student-run radio station last semester is that Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. School of Journalism and Mass Communications, ordered a change in programming on Thursday.

His order was in part due to the strong voice of the Black Student Union, who had lobbied for the return of the urban music program, "Jam the Box." BSU was well within its rights, and even responsibility, to campaign for the interests of minorities. Simon's decision sets an unwelcome precedent that groups can change the decisions of the KSDB student executive staff successfully.

Granted, Simon is essentially the licensee of the station. Because the station is licensed to the university, he acts as the general manager, but even he knows the strongest campus radio stations are those that are run by student., without administrative interference. Simon's role should be that of a figurehead, not of a controller. Decisions such as programming should be left in the hands of students. Even if the decision seems to be a mistake, it's their mistake to make.

It has been stressed that KSDB acts as a lab environment for the students who work there. While Simon's role of general manager is real in any station setting, the changes in programming are more along the lines of censorship than management.

When members of the executive board have their decisions nullified, it not only hurts their credibility, but the credibility of a radio station that is trying to make a name for itself.

Program director's statements about JMC director, BSU misguided

Editor,

As a recent member of KSDB-FM 91.9's executive committee, I applaud the efforts of those in charge, including Program Director Jeremy Claeys, as they attempt to bring the new Wildcat 91.9 more audience members and more monetary support. During my tenure at K-State, including my time on the board, it seemed as if this particular campus outlet got short-changed on both of these issues.

Prior to my time on campus, I was a full-time promotions director for KLZR-FM 105.9 The Lazer, in Lawrence. While on campus, I worked part-time at KMKF-FM 101.5 K-Rock. The fact that these two stations are talking about or altering programming because of the new Wildcat 91.9 is cause for pats on the back all around. These commercial stations are viable in their own right, and the fact that KSDB is positively mentioned in the same sentence with them means good things are in the offing.

However, I object to Claeys' statement that Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, reinstated "Jam the Box" to the 8 p.m.-midnight slot because "It just happens to be Black History Month and the 30th anniversary for BSU at K-State."

Admittedly, many mistakes were made prior to KSDB's return to a student-run station. But let's not get too big for our britches, Mr. Claeys. Program directors at commercial stations inevitably answer to general managers. While not associated with the day to day tasks of KSDB, Simon is, in essence, the general manager.

Program directors at commercial stations, no matter what the format is, play their most popular music between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m. Having specialty programming, including the popular "Jam the Box" from 8 p.m.-midnight, won't begin to take a bite out of your efforts to mainstream the station. On the contrary: The loyal following that program has might continue to bring the most underwriting revenue (the college radio station equivalent of advertising revenue) to KSDB.

While the most vocal detractors of the "Jam the Box" move might have been from the Black Student Union, I'm sure they weren't the only ones. While K-State doesn't have a huge black student population, they aren't the only ones who listen to the program. A lot of white students, Hispanic students and Asian students also enjoy the program. If this reinstatement had happened in May, would Claeys have attributed it to being because of Cinco de Mayo? Or in October, because of the German Oktoberfest?

His statement is insulting not only to the spirit of Black History Month, but also to the credibility of Simon. Someone of his legal and academic background doesn't make crucial decisions such as this one because of potential protests. If you feel he did this solely to make the black people on campus happy, then you have a lot more to learn about radio in general before your transition to radio in the real world.

Idealism vs. Realism

Parents teach columnist different thought patterns

I am living in a realistic world, and I am an idealistic girl.

Lately, I've been constantly debating whether it's better to believe strongly that anything is possible and that there could be perfection in the world or to whether I should root my feet firmly in the concrete road of reality and adopt the view that perfection in any form is unattainable.

As long as I can remember, half of my mind has been wearing a wreath of flowers, and the other half has been encased in concrete. Consequently, I suffer from mood swings.

If we look at my moodiness from a nurture rather than nature perspective, I can see how both of my parents played an equal part in rubbing their reasoning juices off on me.

My idealism comes from my father and his grand dreaming of ways to make life perfect and to one day take us to Disney World. When I go home, my dad and I play pool and dream aloud of what we'll do and have someday.

My realism comes from my mother — the person who set bills and "buts" in front of my father, nipping most of his idealistic fantasies in the bud. Without my mother's realistic attitude, I wouldn't know how to save money, how to make sensible decisions when it comes down to it, and I wouldn't be so incredibly afraid of my student loans.

It's like I have both my mother and my father inside my head. The idealistic/realistic dichotomy wrestles around and is nothing but trouble as I swing from incredible hope to distress.

The idealistic part of me sees a problem, comes up with a solution that I find perfectly logical, and is ready to take on the world — revolutionizing the way we think and act and the way we run things.

It seems so easy at first. For example, I would just decide change starts with the individual, and in order to create change I should go door to door, creating relationships with everyone I talk to and convincing all that change is necessary and that change is good. Or, I decide that since I don't want to become a politician, I should become a good citizen and write a letter to my Republican senator and convince him of the importance of increased breast cancer research funding or the danger of animal testing to human beings.

Or I decide that I should never give up the dream that someday the world will be pollution and corruption free and will be a wonderful, happy, nuclear bombless place to have children in.

This year, my idealism thought I should write a weekly column in the Collegian and encourage change and harmony.

Usually 10 minutes, one day or a month after I get a great idea, the realistic mother in me makes me realize that my revelation will never be as apparent in the minds of those who are happy remaining the same and thinking only about themselves, so incomplete victory is inevitable.

My hopes for a brighter future are dashed when everyone I talk to just pats me on the head saying, "Yeah, yeah, that's a wonderful idea Mary," and when I realize that most of the problems are too big and too many people don't care.

One minute there's hope for a brighter future, and then there's realization that as much as I want to change the world, reality tells me it's a lost cause. Reality slaps me in the face but doesn't stop me from feeling like it's my duty as a human being to work towards a brighter future. It knocks me down but doesn't stop me from feeling guilty that I have it so much better than others do. Being idealistic and realistic can be pretty stressful and downright disheartening.

However, I don't know which I would rather give up. Should I become a completely idealistic person who jumps right into trying to incite change in a community that is happy remaining the same and then is repeatedly disappointed? Maybe I should become a person who doesn't care about what needs to be done or what should be done to make the world a livable, nonthreatening place for all; a person who lives by the words "this is the way it's always been"; and a person who doesn't feel guilty all the time for the privileged life I lead as a Caucasian American woman with a Catholic upbringing. Maybe I should let someone else shoulder the burden while I go watch Jerry Springer or kick my cat.

Maybe I just analyze things too much. It's entirely possible. But which is better to have — realism or idealism?

Giving in to demands sets precedent for other groups

Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communication, recently mandated that "Jam the Box," an urban music show on KSDB-FM 91.9, be moved to an earlier time slot. The Black Student Union demanded the change because it felt the later time slot could be seen as discriminatory and a demotion to minority and cultural groups on campus.

The door has been opened to other groups that haven't been recognized by the station previously and might want their own shows and time slots.

The theater majors, quite cultural students, should be furious. Everyone knows theater majors only listen to show tunes. They should feel as if the radio station has treated them like second-class citizens by refusing to play show tunes.

In addition, they should request the show-tunes program air sometime after 11 a.m. Everyone knows theater majors never wake up before then.

They should also notice that while both the football team and theater majors are performers, the football team receives more coverage from the radio station. The football games have a color commentator that announces the games play-by-play. The football games last semester were followed by a call-in radio show that analyzed the game. The theater majors should want the same. They should demand a play-by-play commentator for each drama production and a post-production show that analyzes their fine performances.

The theater majors aren't the only ones who ought to be complaining. The math, science and computer science majors should want their own show as well. They should demand a radio show be broadcast after each "Star Trek" episode. The radio program would be an in-depth analysis of each "Star Trek" character and episode.

Students in the College of Agriculture also should be fightin' mad. They should demand the radio station quote hog prices every hour. They should also request a country music show, preferably one aired from sunrise to 7:30 a.m. Everyone knows students in agriculture would want to listen while they milked the cows.

Student Senate should want a piece of the action, too, in the form of a C-Span-esque program that broadcasted every Senate meeting live. Broadcasting every meeting live would benefit the entire campus by keeping students informed.

After hearing the demands of other groups, the Greeks undoubtedly would decide to follow suit and request their own music show that played the same music as other popular stations. They might ask for music by the Spice Girls, Hanson, 'N Sync and the Backstreet Boys.

Absolutely ridiculous and stereotypical, of course, but the logic used by BSU and Simon, to determine that moving a radio show might be viewed as discriminatory.

Shame on BSU for promoting the stereotype that black students are the only or primary students who listen to urban music.

Shame on them for screaming discrimination when that so obviously wasn't the case. Save those cries for when they are truly, absolutely necessary so you don't become the little boy who cried wolf.

Shame on Simon and those who pressured him into this decision to give in to silly, frivolous demands. Shame on you, because should any other group decide "their music" isn't being played enough and complain, you will be left with no choice but to give in to their demands.

The changes at KSDB have been a blessing to this campus. The station has a greater responsibility to keeping students informed and as a learning tool for broadcasting students than it has to promoting diversity. It has listeners now; before, it really didn't. It is hard to learn from your mistakes when no one is listening. Because it has listeners, it also can keep the campus informed and serve as a line of communication for the students.

Education in broadcasting should have been the driving force behind Simon's decision.

This is about the new radio station playing rap from 8 to midnight. I think there's plenty of stations playing that kind of music, and there aren't that many stations playing modern rock except the Lazer, and not everybody can get that in. So I like the format the way it is. Listen to 94.5 if you want to listen to rap.

I was initially encouraged to hear of improvements at the student radio station, but after a month of listening I was very disappointed at the top-100 alternative format that is being used.

Please bring back the diversity, particularly the reggae music that was being played Sunday afternoon.

Hey Becky, your story about KU — if you love them so much why don't you just go there and leave us alone.

This is about the campus radio station. I think they should continue playing modern rock 'cause there's no modern rock around here, and that's what the majority of people around here want. If they want to have a rap hour, make it a show one night a week to appease those who want it. If they go back to the old music, no one's going to listen.

I don't see what the big deal is about urban music being played on 91.9. Why does it have to be in a four-hour time slot? Why can't you mix it in with all the other music so there would be some every hour? That would make a lot more sense.

It sure is nice to see that the 3-percent black population has more voice than the other 97 percent of the students and the power to scare the administration in Anderson into overriding the student executive staff. Censorship much?

I wanted to thank the staff of 91.9 for standing up against BSU and trying to play what the majority of K-State students want to hear.

Hey DB92, where's the hair bands? We want metal. We want metal. I think if those 12 people can make a difference, that's good. But that one person who's trying to make a difference needs to shut up.

We're calling in concern for the new format of 91.9. I think it stinks that one organization can dictate what a student radio station plays that is strictly for the masses.

Instead of trying to appeal to a majority audience, a college radio station should reflect the great diversity of students. DB92 should be about broadening people's horizons.

To hell with popularity and market research.

I think the best way to restore the basketball program is to move back to Ahearn and lose Tom Asbury along the way.

As far as I'm concerned, Becky Guthrie can go to KU and leave KSU alone. Homosexuality is unethical.

I sure hope that when the new format of 91.9 goes into effect we'll hear some members of the Black Student Union participating in this and using the radio station as a learning tool and not just their entertainment.

I don't particularly care for rap on DB92. I think it's stupid. I'm just wondering where Russell Fortmeyer is this semester. I really miss his deep and knowledgeable columns and his deep insight into college life. Maybe you could even run some of his old columns.

We need more Ken Wells' columns. He's awesome.

I'm being discriminated against by DB92 because I'm from the country and they don't play country music.

I would just like to say the Collegian has a real winner with the Gongfarmers. It's funny and surreal, and I hope it sticks around for a while.

I absolutely love the Conspiracy Theory, and I love the guys who do it.

I often wonder what Fubu means. It means "for us and by us" and it's made by black designers. You do the math.

I have an opinion over the controversy over the 91.9. I feel there's plenty of radio stations to listen to hard rock, heavy metal and country.

We just want our own station to listen to R&B, hip-hop, jazz or any type of urban or diversified music. We just ask for one station, and that's DB92.

WHERE'S KEN WELLS?

I'm being discriminated against by DB92 because I'm from the country and they don't play country music.

I would just like to say the Collegian has a real winner with the Gongfarmers. It's funny and surreal, and I hope it sticks around for a while.

I absolutely love the Conspiracy Theory, and I love the guys who do it.

I often wonder what Fubu means. It means "for us and by us" and it's made by black designers. You do the math.

I have an opinion over the controversy over the 91.9. I feel there's plenty of radio stations to listen to hard rock, heavy metal and country.

We just want our own station to listen to R&B, hip-hop, jazz or any type of urban or diversified music. We just ask for one station, and that's DB92.

A senior football team member goes up for a shot Sunday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum as part of the K-State football players' Senior Farewell Tour. The seniors lost the game, 77-78, to a team of volunteers representing the American Diabetes Association on a last-second, half-court shot. All proceeds from the event went to the ADA.

If the first contest of the 1998-99 Senior Farewell Tour of senior members of the K-State football team is any indication of how the remaining games will unravel, fans will be in for a treat.

The Wildcats, on the basketball court for a benefit tour, played a team of volunteers representing the American Diabetes Association and narrowly lost 77-78 on a buzzer-beating half-court shot thrown up by former Cats quarterback Matt Miller, who finished the contest with 16 points.

"We'll play them again," said quarterback Michael Bishop, who posted 19 points for the senior team. "We'll definitely get a rematch."

The game was split up into two 25-minute halves with the game clock running continuously. The senior team trailed the ADA team 55-44 after the first half, but thanks in part to Martin Gramatica's half-court shot during the halftime intermission, the seniors gained 10 points to close the gap to 55-54.

The ADA team led 75-71 with 1:45 to play after current Wildcat coach and former player Michael Smith drained a three-point shot.

The seniors then reeled off six straight points, culminating with Eric Hickson's NBA-range three-point shot to give the seniors the lead 77-75 with 28 seconds left.

Several ADA players attempted shots before Miller got a hold of the ball with seconds remaining and launched his prayer shot that miraculously fell through the net.

The idea for the tour was brought up by John Bishop, Eastern Regional director of the ADA. The proceeds from all five contests will be donated to the ADA.

"Amongst other things, the proceeds will go towards educational materials and our summer camp held for children with diabetes in June in Junction City," Bishop said. "We're hoping to raise about $50,000."

Amigos leaves without explanation

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amigos left both Manhattan Town Center and the K-State Student Union over winter break.

The Mexican fast-food restaurant chain left Town Center on Dec. 31, and its express cart left the Union shortly afterward.

Allen Raynor, general manager for Manhattan Town Center, said Amigos did not explain the reasons for its departure.

"I don't know why, but they just up and left on us," Raynor said. "My guess is that it was a corporate decision, and their lease was near the end. They must have just decided to leave early."

Union Executive Director Bernard Pitts said that the Union had been discussing the presence of Amigos in the new food court, which is scheduled to open before next fall, but he wasn't sure why it left, either.

"I am assuming that the Union Amigos closed because the Town Center restaurant was the base for its express cart," he said.

"They probably just made some assessments and decided that it was fiscally best for their company to close both units," Pitts said.

Pitts also said the company that owns Amigos, Growth Management Corp., also is franchising A&W stores, so it might have been redirecting its resources.

Neither establishment has found a definite replacement for the restaurant.

"Our leasing department is working on new tenants all the time," Raynor said. "A replacement will fill Amigos' place sooner than later, but I can't say exactly when."

Town Center has a policy against discussing pending negotiations, Raynor said.

Pitts said that the Union still is negotiating to determine the final component of its new food court, but that it is committed to finding a high-quality Mexican restaurant.

"Right now we are exploring other concepts to accommodate the need for a Mexican restaurant," he said. "Through a survey done a few years ago, we discovered that Mexican food is one of K-State students' top choices, so it is important for us to include that concept in our food court."

The new food court is part of an $11.5 million renovation of the Union. Other types of food that will be available in the new dining center are hamburgers, chicken, subs, Chinese and an a la carte selection.

A drawing of plans for the center is posted on the first floor of the Union.

Defensive coordinator might leave K-State for Baltimore Ravens

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several members of the news media who cover K-State football have reported that defensive coordinator Rex Ryan will leave K-State to take a defensive coaching position for the Baltimore Ravens.

However, public relations departments at K-State and Baltimore, have said the Ravens have not yet announced the signing of Ryan as the defensive line coach.

"I talked to Coach Snyder last night, and it is my understanding that Baltimore has not announced any hiring at that position yet," Kent Brown, K-State director of sports information, said.

"Apparently, the Baltimore Sun listed Coach Ryan as a leading candidate for an assistant coaching position with the Ravens," he said.

Kevin Byrne, vice president of public relations for Baltimore, said the Ravens have not released news of the signing of a defensive line coach yet, but head coach Brian Billick has stated he is considering Ryan for the position.

"When we have a defensive line coach, we will announce it," Byrne said. "Coach Billick said he would have one by next week. I do know that Coach Billick thinks highly of Coach Ryan, and that he was considered for a defensive position."

Brown said if the Ravens inform K-State beforehand they are in fact hiring Ryan, then sports information might put out a press release, but most likely not. Any official announcements will probably come from the Ravens.

In a Thursday afternoon press conference, K-State head coach Bill Snyder said he did not know if Ryan would leave for the Ravens and that there is no best time to find a replacement for the defensive coordinator position.

If Ryan does sign with the Ravens and K-State has a vacancy, Brown said Snyder will handle the hiring of a new coordinator.

"That's something Coach Snyder pretty much does," he said. "If the position does in fact open up, he'll proceed like he normally does, by assembling a list of candidates and then interviewing them."

Ryan replaced Mike Stoops, who left to become defensive coordinator at Oklahoma under his brother Bob Stoops.

Ryan was announced as the new defensive coordinator for the Wildcats after the Builders Square Alamo Bowl on Dec. 29.

Despite the possible departure of Ryan, K-State still has several experienced defensive coaches who could fill the vacancy if.

Phil Bennett has experience as a defensive coordinator at two Big 12 schools, Iowa State and Texas A&M, while K-State defensive line coach Jim Gush was a defensive coordinator at Garden City Community College before becoming Garden City's head coach.

Road Rash Redeemed

K-State forward Tony Kitt and Cyclone center Martin Rancik got tangled up as they scramble for a loose ball during the first half of Saturday's game at Hilton Coliseum in Ames, Iowa. Saturday's win marked only the second conference road win for the Wildcats since Big 12 play began in 1996.

Cats claw back into conference race

By JOSHUA KINDER

Coming off a devastating 69-46 loss to Kansas and desperately needing a Big 12 Conference victory, the K-State men's basketball team used a 20-5 second-half run to come back and defeat Iowa State, 67-62, Saturday at Hilton Coliseum.

It was the Cats' second Big 12 road victory ever and their first since Feb. 7, 1998, against Nebraska.

"The game basically was won in a couple of areas," Wildcats head coach Tom Asbury said after the game. "You look at nine turnovers — for us that's very good — 16 assists, we shoot 56 percent in the second half and they shoot 27, basically, that should win."

Despite trailing by nine at halftime, the Cats (15-8 overall, 4-6 conference) began the 20-5 run at the Cyclones (13-10, 4-6), ignited by Ayome May's basket.

Junior guard Josh Reid found himself in foul trouble early in the first half, but came out shooting in the second. He made four three-point baskets and sank another with 13:45 remaining to give the Cats their first lead of the game. K-State eventually would hold on by making 10 of its last 12 free-throw attempts.

"Once he gets on a roll, he won't stop," forward Manny Dies said of Reid, who had 14 second-half points. "I think that when he came out of the locker room, he was pretty focused on having an impact on the game in the second half, and he did."

The first half left the Cats being out-rebounded, 21-12, and shooting a less-than-staggering 33 percent from the field.

After trailing 18-9 at the 12:05 mark, then 23-13 at the 8:37 mark, the Cats managed to stay in the game using a late first-half surge when Dies scored six straight points during a 10-5 run to end the half.

With the Wildcats trailing at halftime and in danger of losing their third straight game, Asbury said he thought the deficit was not insurmountable.

"I thought we closed it a little bit before halftime," Asbury said. "We made a few plays. I thought that we kind of weathered the storm by halftime. I thought that if we just came out and took a little better care of the ball and got better shots, we would be OK."

One of the Wildcats' biggest concerns was to try to figure out how to guard the Cyclones' Marcus Fizer, who came into the game averaging 18.1 points a game.

Fizer managed to score a quiet 21 points against K-State, despite a good defensive effort from the Cats' inside players.

K-State placed five players in double figures, led by Dies' 16 points and Rhodes' 12. Groves and May scored 11 and 10, respectively.

The Cats hope to use the road victory to set themselves up for the remaining conference games and the Big 12 Tournament.

"I don't know about the rest of the team, I'll speak for myself, but right now we're positioning ourselves to do something in the Big 12 Tournament," Dies said.

"We needed this win to move up in the seeds. Ever since coach told us to play every game like it's the last game, that's the way I feel I have to play."

Team splits to compete in 2 meets

■ Track team travels to Nebraska and Iowa State for Invitational.

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State track and field athletes had the choice to compete for competition or compete for speed this weekend.

The team split up this weekend to travel to Nebraska's Husker Invitational, on a 200-meter track with tight competition, and the Iowa State Classic, on a 300-meter track likely to yield better times.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said he was pleased with the consistency of some athletes in the Husker Invitational, and that others had significant achievements in these meets.

"Overall, it was a good meet, I think," Rovelto said. "The quality of the meet is always very good. As far as we were concerned, on the women's side, Erin Anderson looked really good. She won in a jump-off, it was very competitive going back and forth and I thought she really handled it well."

Anderson earned first place with a school record in the pole vault, and Rachel Woods was second.

Darcy Morris was fourth in the 400 meters, achieving a personal record.

Renetta Seiler, placed second in the weight throw with a throw Rovelto said was average for her but still very good. Charles Burney and Attila Zsivoczky placed second and third, respectively, in the high jump with jumps of 7 feet, 1 inch.

At Iowa State, Emily Diederich led the women's distance runners with a provisional qualifying time in the 800-meter run, and Annie Wetterhus and Amanda Crouse showed consistency.

"They all ran solid, they didn't run significantly faster than they had previously, but they ran solidly," Rovelto said.

"The bottom line is, it comes down to head-to-head competition and they beat good people, so that's important."

Crouse earned a personal record in her mile run and said this was a good sign heading toward the climax of the indoor track season.

"I was happy with it because, while it was a personal record for me, I feel like I can go faster," Crouse said.

"I know there's more down there, I just need to push through the 4:50 barrier. Mostly, it's just going to be mental."

With athletes now focusing on the Big 12 Conference Meet, which will be at K-State on February 19-20, Rovelto anticipates a very close meet for both teams and said small strides taken at this weekend's meets and in the next two weeks might make a great deal of difference.

"As we look ahead to the conference meet, it's going to be so close, there literally could be less than 10 points between fourth and ninth or 10th place," he said.

"The meet is going to be so, so close, and there's so many teams that are really close, that every little improvement, every little advantage we can scrape up, is pretty significant."

The women's team maintained its first-place NCAA ranking, and the men's team dropped to 17th. Rovelto said the two teams have very different expectations for the Big 12 meet.

Hero Walter Payton fights for his life as columnist reminisces of 'Sweetness'

VIEWPOINT

BRATKOVIC

As sports fans, we go through life watching the best athletes play in the biggest games.

When they retire, we move on, assuming our heroes always will be there, lurking in the shadows, making new inroads in society and living normal lives.

So when word spread out of Chicago last Tuesday that Walter Payton was sick, I was stunned.

Payton told members of the media and the public that he has a rare liver disease and needs a transplant. He spoke determinedly about beating the disease, and I hope he does.

All too often people we admire most are taken from us too soon, and faced with battles nobody wants to fight. Payton is once again in the national spotlight, but this time the gridiron is not his stage.

Payton was one of the first athletes I remember from when I was growing up. His 1985 Chicago Bears were a powerhouse. They had a 15-1 regular season and beat New England in the Super Bowl.

The week before the big game, I remember waking up with my ghetto blaster blaring the "Super Bowl Shuffle."

In the song, Payton's voice boomed, "My name is 'Sweetness,' and I like to dance."

Wow, I thought, I hope they win.

What a cool song.

That's what was great about being a kid. Sports were still pure. Cool songs helped us determine whom we wanted to win. We didn't understand the stuff that takes away from sports like drugs, sex and contract disputes.

We didn't understand money, agents or anything like that.

Sex was the farthest thing from anybody's mind. If it was on television, I'd switch channels, hoping to catch "Transformers."

We didn't understand drugs. Cocaine looked like sugar. Weed was something my parents hated to see grow on the lawn.

Contract disputes were just two big words that meant about as much as frontal lobotomy. Being a kid was simple. We cared about which team won the game, not what they did off the field.

Payton was part of what made sports pure. He was an unbelievable player who had talent and an awesome ability to make tacklers miss.

In our minds, we aspired to be like Walter, even though we knew few of us ever could. The bottom line is, I loved watching him play.

Now, 14 years after the 1985 Super Bowl, Payton is fighting for his life. For me, his situation is different from what Mickey Mantle went through. Not that I don't like Mantle. I love Mickey. He was a great player, but I never saw him play. I never heard the crack of his bat as he hit one out. The closest I came to seeing Mantle play was a "Seinfeld" episode, and that ended in a bench-clearing brawl.

I saw Payton play in the biggest game of all, the Super Bowl. Walter Payton is one of our generation's heroes, and that makes him real. He isn't a guy we saw clips of and saw on an "NFL Films Presents" episode. He is No. 34 for the Chicago Bears, and we remember watching him do what he loved best.

As one of our guys, Payton inspired athletes to excel and be like him. He inspired kids everywhere to learn how to juke, jump and, more importantly, score touchdowns. Some would say he was the greatest ever, but that's debatable.

Whether you believe he is or isn't doesn't matter, because today's running backs are still compared with Payton. Watching SportsCenter highlights of Barry Sanders triggered comparisons with Payton.

We remember Payton juking, grooving and stopping on a dime. We remember the Super Bowl Shuffle and all the great plays. Let's just hope Payton lives to see the golden years, and our children can ask, "Who's that man on television?"

We can tell them he is one of the greatest players ever to play professional football. Let's hope our kids can look at him the way we look at Mantle; with a bit of wonderment about how he played, but never fully understanding. To fully understand, you would have had to have watched him play.

"Sweetness" is back in the spotlight, and now we get to watch him dance in his biggest game yet, the game of life.

Wanda Holthaus, junior in pre-professional secondary education, flattens out the crust of a pizza Sunday afternoon at Pizza Shuttle. Since Dec. 26, Pizza Shuttle has advertised prices that were raised 12 to 14 percent.

Pricy Pizza

Pizza parlors deal with increasing ingredient costs

Most Manhattan residents with a TV set or a radio have heard the jingle for Pizza Shuttle.

Many K-State students with hunger pangs at 3 a.m. have made the call.

Anyone who has paid the delivery man lately has realized the prices at the Pizza Shuttle have gone up.

On Dec. 26, Manhattan's Pizza Shuttle began advertising its new price lists, complete with a 12- to 14-percent increase on menu items.

Dick Botbyl, owner of the franchise store since its opening more than 10 years ago, said he credits the higher charges on the increasing prices of ingredients.

"We had to raise our prices because of the price of our commodities," Botbyl said. "Cheese is at a record high, and the price of tomatoes is just as bad."

Paul Suellentrop, proprietor of Gambino's Pizza, said he agreed with Botbyl.

"The prices of ingredients has gone up an incredible amount," he said. "They started to go sky high in early August, and they just started to taper off in late January."

Local pizza parlors are beginning to feel the crunch of rising market prices for traditional pie toppings, Suellentrop said. He said many favorite toppings of Manhattan residents are at record-high prices due to a new way of buying and selling.

"They're trading things differently now," Suellentrop said. "Everything is now traded on the commodities market, and that really affects your prices."

Another reason Botbyl cited for the rising price of pizza is the low rate of unemployment in Manhattan.

"You really have to have competitive wages in Manhattan to hire good people," he said.

Suellentrop said employees are an important part of making pricing decisions.

"The two things you have to think about when running a restaurant are food costs and labor costs," he said.

While Pizza Shuttle's management has taken action to combat the commodities market problem, other pizza franchise owners of Manhattan said they have no plans to raise prices in the near future.

"We're trying different things to avoid raising prices," Suellentrop said. "We added pastas, baked sandwiches and other items to our menu."

While some franchise owners might dictate their own prices, Carol Thistlethwaite, co-owner of Bredeaux Pizza, said she has not heard word from corporate officials concerning price increases.

"That decision has not been made for us, but we didn't raise our prices when minimum wage was raised," she said.

Suellentrop said Manhattan pizza lovers should get used to price hikes at their favorite restaurants.

"It's a competitive market," he said. "One place raises prices, then prices are raised all over town."

Thistlethwaite also said while Bredeaux Pizza will avoid increasing charges for now, it is important to keep in mind consumers still will receive a high-quality product.

"Quality dictates whether price increases are made," she said. "You can't really compare prices of pizza places without looking at quality."

Although the prices might make more than a few people think twice before ordering, some students said Pizza Shuttle's higher charges don't bother them too much.

"That probably wouldn't discourage me," Bree Bisnette, senior in public relations, said. "They're still probably the cheapest pizza place in town."

Joe Lenz, sophomore in pre-nursing, said early morning orders are sometimes a necessity.

"When it's two in the morning and you've just gotten home from the bars, the prices don't really matter," he said.

Local musicians can gain experience with lessons

By JUSTIN VANNIST
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Those who are tired of playing air guitar can try the real thing with a few lessons and a little cash.

Manhattan has several locations where the budding musician can learn the guitarist's tricks of the trade.

Rick's Music Shop & Guitar Service and Glenn's Music offer lessons for those interested.

Jed Wymore, professional instructor at Glenn's Music, said he has pupils of all ages and it is never too late to learn how to play.

"I teach people that are from 8 years old to 80," Wymore said.

Wymore has a master's degree in music education from Emporia State University. He has played in local groups for more than 12 years and does studio work for people in Manhattan.

Wymore said he is very busy when it comes to teaching guitar.

"I have about 80 students in one week," he said.

Wymore's students enter his lessons on many different levels of playing experience.

"I teach beginning, intermediate, advanced and professional lessons," Wymore said. "I can also teach people to play by ear or to read music."

Wymore said his lessons offer a variety of music styles.

"I teach rock and country mostly, but I can teach other styles as well," he said. "During the first lesson, I sit down and ask what they want to learn, so each of my lessons is different for everyone."

Wymore said he gives lessons in other instruments as well.

"I also teach electric bass, banjo and mandolin," Wymore said. "It is mostly older people who want to learn those, because the kids just want to get a hold of a guitar."

Hollis Berry, part-time guitar instructor at Rick's Music Shop & Guitar Service, said he teaches 40 students.

Berry was a member of the band "Smudge," which won Union Program Council's annual Band Competition in 1995.

He said he has many more students lined up to take lessons.

"We have a waiting list of those that want to get in," Berry said.

In addition to individual lessons, Berry offers group lessons twice a week.

Like Wymore, Berry said his students range in age.

"I have given lessons to people from 9 to a lady in her 60s," Berry said. "Most of my students are college-age students."

In addition to lessons, Rick's Music Shop & Guitar Service offers other methods of learning guitar.

"We sell videos and books and CDs to help everyone from the beginner on up," said Rick Hood, owner of Rick's Music Shop & Guitar Service.

Feeding mind and body, restaurants stay open late

By JUSTIN VANNIST
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Manhattan offers several options for K-State students who are looking for a place to do some late-night cramming, satisfy the munchies at 3 a.m. and hang out with friends at the same time.

One of the more popular places to go is Village Inn, which is open 24 hours a day, except Sunday from midnight to 6 a.m.

"We get quite a few college students in here at night," Misty Piper, Village Inn's assistant manager said. "We usually have a lot of people here between 9 p.m. and 3 a.m., studying and such."

Most patrons come to study, Piper said, but many come to see friends and relax.

"Lots of times, when they come in, they go visit their friends at other tables," Piper said.

Down the road is Bob's Diner, another restaurant frequented by K-State students. It also is open 24 hours a day.

Nicole Belville, waitress at Bob's Diner, said many of the students she encounters are regulars at the restaurant.

"Many of them come here to study, and you get to know what they eat and how they like their coffee," Belville said. "You get to talking and joking with them," she said.

Belville said she was pleased with how well some students tip.

"They usually leave $2 or $3," Belville said, "and that is a lot better than most of our older customers."

Although both restaurants experience periodic rushes, Piper said, the busiest time of year is usually finals. Piper said she makes sure that extra staff is on hand for these periods.

Belville said the situation is similar at Bob's Diner.

"This entire place is filled with people camped out studying," she said.

"They have their books and papers everywhere," Belville said.

Shannon McGuire, sophomore in public relations and English, said she thinks going with her friends to restaurants such as Village Inn can be a time-consuming — but enjoyable — activity.

"We are usually here for two hours," McGuire said, "but we have spent up to five hours here before."

McGuire said she believes these restaurants are effective locations for students to go to study.

"If you go to the library, you see a lot of your friends and don't get a lot done," she said.

LAFENE

Lafene is funded by student privilege fees that are paid by every student based on credit hours. The fee for Lafene is $77 per semester for a full-time student.

The privilege fees support 65 percent of Lafene's operating expenses and allow K-State students unlimited office visits to see a doctor or a nurse for free, Zweimiller said. They also subsidize other services such as X-rays, lab work and pharmaceutical prescriptions to make the services cheaper for students.

He said the remainder of Lafene's funding comes from charging for services other than office visits.

allocation that is not required to be repaid. Privilege Fee Committee Chairman Jeff Meder said.

Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and acting KSDB station director, presented the committee with another increase in funds for the general operating budget. After reviewing the original proposal of $35,000, a $16,332 increase was sought for station manager raises. The newly proposed fee totals $51,332.

Also at issue was a question of station control. The current FCC licensing

In order to raise enough money to keep the health center operating, there either must be an increase in student privilege fees, an increase in service charges or a combination of those alternatives, or services could be cut completely, Zweimiller said.

The results of the survey should be known by the end of the semester, and the new policy will be implemented in fall 2000.

"As an administrator, I like the 65-percent/35-percent mix of funding sources, because it keeps costs down but allows patients to be responsible for some of the payment, too," he said. "But we will take whatever students want into consideration when the decision is made."

agreement for KSDB states the Kansas Board of Regents has control over operation of the radio station.

Claeys added two sections to the original bill stipulating that infringements on student control of the station by administration or faculty at K-State is cause for the committee to terminate funding.

"Any intervention into the programming or format of KSDB by the administration or faculty of Kansas State University or the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications shall result in the immediate suspension of all student funds to KSDB. Any current and future student fee dollars allocated to KSDB shall be suspended until down on disruptive alcohol use.

University Housing revised its policies in 1997 to include: calling parents for certain violations, setting up a mandatory referral for alcohol education and evaluation through the University Health Center, reducing the number of appeals available to students, and mandating minimum sanctions for different violations.

Since then, Zatechka has seen a change in the form of less noise and less boisterous and destructive behavior.

In 1997-98 Nebraska's Student Judicial Affairs received 129 alcohol cases — 38 percent of all infractions processed by the office. Of those, 92 originated in the residence halls; 37 in the Greek system.

Lincoln police also are cracking down on underage drinking by dedicating seven officers to respond only to off-campus parties. During six nights in September, officers issued 91 citations or arrests in targeted neighborhoods.

The city had 513 party complaints in 1998, down from 565 in 1997. In targeted areas, complaints declined from 150 in 1997 to 111 in 1998.

"We're not so naive to think we can stop the drinking by people under age 21 or stop the parties," Casady said. "But, the more vigorous enforcement can minimize some of the higher risk drinking."

Noor, had kept a painful vigil at the king's bedside while thousands of citizens sobbed at the hospital gates.

In keeping with Islamic tradition, the funeral took place quickly — an enormous procession through the streets of Amman just 24 hours after Hussein died. The elaborately plotted protocols, although, reflected real-life regional tensions.

Underscoring Jordan's determination that the transition be swift and smooth, Hussein's eldest son Abdullah, 37, was sworn in just four hours later in a solemn ceremony at parliament.

Leaders discuss motivation

By CRISTY ANDERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Greek leaders must live out their organizations' commitment to individual members in order to motivate other members, said Mary Peterson, associate director of the Office of Student Life at the University of Iowa.

Peterson was the guest speaker for the Greek Leadership Conference on Sunday in Forum Hall. Officers from Greek chapters attended the conference.

She said the secrets to running a good greek chapter are written in the first few pages of each house's new member manual. These manuals promise to provide members with honesty, integrity and the highest level of trust, Peterson said.

"People become unmotivated and apathetic when other people are lying and backstabbing, a direct violation of what the organization promises," she said.

Peterson also stressed the importance of gathering members of the chapter together to discuss the values and principles their organization was founded on.

She said members of a sorority or fraternity are there because they made a free-will choice to be there. By making this choice, students imply being involved in a greek house is important to them.

"If you don't feel committed to these values anymore, that's fine. You are no less of a person," Peterson said. "But you can't wear the letters."

Greek leaders were challenged and motivated by Peterson's speech.

"I appreciated Peterson's challenges and in-your-face attitude about tough issues facing the greek community," Andrew Jones, sophomore in education, said.

Peterson said K-State's greek community handles challenges well.

"K-State has a solid greek community," she said. "Yeah, they have challenges. But K-State is a school that will try to bring about changes to deal with these challenges."

Peterson credits much of the strength of K-State's greek community to Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs.

"I've known Barb for 15 years," Peterson said. "I looked up to her like a mentor. She is truly committed to the students. She's one-of-a-kind in the country."

After Peterson's speech, officers went to round-table sessions to discuss upcoming events and issues that face the greek community.

Robel said the conference was created to provide current and prospective officers with information they can use to better lead their chapters.

Closing statements begin in Clinton's Senate trial

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With a perjury charge in deep trouble and acquittal virtually assured, senators on Sunday looked beyond President Clinton's impeachment trial to a censure resolution that could unify Republicans and Democrats in a strong condemnation of his conduct. But even censure had opposition.

The entire impeachment drama appears certain to be over by the end of the week.

Several senators said the article alleging grand jury perjury — one of two impeachment articles approved by the House on Dec. 19 — could fail to muster even a majority, despite the Republicans' 55-45 edge in the Senate.

Almost everyone involved agreed that the remaining article — charging Clinton with obstructing justice — will fall short of the two-thirds majority needed to convict Clinton and eject him from the presidency.

Working with Democrats on the post-trial alternative of censure, Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, said it was still "very much up in the air" whether language will be found to gain the votes that are needed to overcome a filibuster.

House prosecutors and the Clinton defense team spent the day packaging familiar evidence into closing statements to be delivered today.

Clinton himself will be attending the funeral of Jordan's King Hussein when the arguments start.

When the roll is called on acquittal or conviction, likely Thursday or Friday, almost all Democrats are expected to oppose both impeachment articles.

Draft censure language floated by Bennett and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., calls the president's conduct "shameless, reckless, and indefensible," and says "he deliberately misled and deceived the American people and officials in all branches of the United States government."

autographs from the Wildcat seniors before the game began.

John Hatesohl and his son Eric were amongst fans in the audience who came out to cheer on the seniors.

"I came to help support the ADA," John Hatesohl said.

Eric, however, came for a different reason.

"It was neat getting the autographs," Eric said.

"I liked getting Eric Hickson's autograph because his name is the same as mine," he said.

There were several drawings during the course of the game, with prizes including a football autographed by all the seniors, a certificate for dinner for two at Harrah's restaurant and an autographed picture of football coach Bill Snyder.

Debbie Bishop of St. Joseph, Mo., was the lucky winner of both the football and the certificate for dinner at Harrah's.

"I'm really glad I came," she said. "I haven't won this much stuff in a long time."

Also auctioned off at halftime was an autographed Michael Bishop jersey, with Hickson, who scored 10 points, performing auctioneer duties.

Helen Hayes of Manhattan prevailed over other members of the crowd to the tune of $235 for the jersey.

"I only bidded to try and get the price up a little," Hayes said.

"But it's for a good cause, so I don't mind," she said.

The farewell tour will resume on Feb. 14 in Seneca, Kan., and then travel to Emporia on Feb. 28. The team will travel to Salina on March 7 before concluding in Topeka on March 14.

Kansas House to consider concealed-weapons bill

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Kansans would be allowed to carry concealed handguns under a bill a House committee will consider this week.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee will have hearings today and Tuesday on a bill that would enable the Kansas Bureau of Investigation to issue licenses allowing people to carry concealed guns beginning Jan. 1, 2000.

Gov. Bill Graves vetoed a similar bill in 1997, and opinions vary widely among legislators.

"I'm concerned about how many children we're going to kill when mom and dad unstrap their gun and lay it on the dresser," said Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park.

Rep. Susan Wagler, R-Wichita, chairwoman of the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, said she supports "the right for citizens who have passed a test and who have proven they are not a threat to carry a weapon."

The bill would require people to complete a weapons safety and training course before they could acquire a license to carry a concealed handgun.

License applicants also would have to be 21 years old, have no felony convictions and have no history of mental illness or drug or alcohol abuse in the previous five years.

Graves might prove to be the biggest obstacle to the bill's enactment. Graves' position on the issue has not changed since his 1997 veto, Mike Matson, his spokesman, said.

Rep. L. Candy Ruff, the bill's chief supporter, has portrayed the right to carry concealed weapons as a women's safety issue. Bond said women's organizations supported the 1997 bill and that he doesn't expect the strategy to change any votes this year.

Hobrock unsure of next course of action for fee

Student share

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock presented a revised funding strategy proposal to the Privilege Fee Committee. The new proposal decreases the student share from $685,431 each year to $360,000 in 1999-2000. The plan calls for an increase in fees each year for inflation.

REQUEST: $360,000
EXPENDITURE PLAN:

I. $180,000
II. $120,000
III. $60,000

I. 3,000 book volumes relating to K-State instructional programs
II. Database licenses, full-text resources
III. Single-article subsidies and document delivery for undergraduates

TODD STEWART/COLLEGIAN

Dean of libraries puzzled by fee committee rejecting 2 Hale Library proposals.

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said he was disappointed after a decision Sunday by the Privilege Fee Committee to reject his proposal for a student privilege fee increase to fund Hale Library. "It's kind of a puzzler," he said. "It appeared as if we looked like we were going to go forward."

Hobrock's proposal for a $1 privilege fee, lowered from his past proposal of a $1.70 fee, would have funded one-eighth of the $3 million needed. Hobrock said ideally, the university needs $7 million for books and journals to compete while at the bottom of the Big 12 Conference in libraries, but his proposal was a compromise.

"The first law of the jungle is to ask what you really need, and the second law of the jungle is to compromise," Hobrock said. "To me, compromise means somewhere in between."

Last year's privilege fee proposal was for 85 cents, and it was defeated in committee and before Senate.

Half of the funds generated from this year's proposal would have been used to buy 3,000 more books. The library spends an average of $60 on each book. He said the money also would have funded undergraduate access to materials on electronic databases and articles on demand.

Hobrock said two bills were presented in the committee, one for a referendum that would have been presented during elections March 8-10 and the other to forward his privilege fee proposal to the Senate.

He said the referendum bill died due to the lack of anyone putting the motion to the floor. It was implied that both the bills would be introduced at Senate, he said.

Jeff Meder, privilege fee chair, said the committee did discuss a student referendum, but nobody moved to author it.

"I think the bottom line issue is we felt the library is a basic staple to the university, and privilege fees are for special things," he said.

Meder used the example of student health services as something that isn't necessary to survive academically but is an important service for students.

A counter-approach, made by a senator, was to approach the Kansas Board of Regents and have the fee added onto the tuition. Meder said any senator could write up a resolution to increase tuition for library purposes only and he thinks senators are interested in the idea. However, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University would have to go together with K-State on the issue, he said, because politically, the regents wouldn't approve it without the support of other schools.

Senate Chair Gabe Eckert said the senators will have to evaluate whether there is a need for a proposal to fund the library.

"Really what Student Senate has to do is look for a long term solution and adding it to the tuition is more a long term solution," Eckert said.

Meder said a senator can offer the $1 fee proposal as a bill or can make changes and bring it up for a first reading in Senate. The bill then would be referred back to committee. The committee could give the bill a favorable or unfavorable recommendation or could hold it in committee. Meder said if it were proposed in Senate, the earliest it could come back to the Privilege Fee Committee would be Feb. 21.

Eckert said he is unsure when it could come up in Senate.

Hobrock said he hasn't decided where to go with the proposal and that he understands the students don't oppose funding the library, they just don't feel the privilege fee is the right way to do it.

"The student piece is the missing link in the university's attempt to build some sort of greatness for the library," Hobrock said.

"We had hoped to use the proposal to persuade students that it was in their best interests."

Last Chance owner purchases vacant lot

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The lot that used to be home to three Aggieville businesses has remained empty for almost a year.

Monday afternoon, Rusty Wilson, owner of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, bought the property to increase the business in Aggieville and diversify the area.

"There will not be more Aggieville property created, so I consider this area to be very valuable," Wilson said.

Wilson said he could not say for sure what he wanted to do with the property, although he said he can guarantee there will not be another bar built there.

"I did it for Aggieville," Wilson said. "There are a lot of bars that keep popping up, and there are too many already. Aggieville is here for the students."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said she is glad to see an Aggieville merchant buy the property because the interest and the future of the area is evident.

"I would be happy for anyone to buy it but am tickled that an Aggieville merchant did," Sieben said. "They already have a special feeling for Aggieville, and it means they have an interest in its future."

Sieben also said money had been lost since the Feb. 14, 1998, fire that destroyed Club Karrington, Adventure Travel and Greek's Pizzeria, but with the purchase, she said she hopes Aggieville will come back bigger and better.

"Losing three viable businesses was a tragedy," Sieben said.

"But I am glad to see the next step in the redevelopment of the lot and the process of getting the block back on its feet."

Wilson said he is considering talking to the city and donating the property to it as a parking lot or is thinking of other ways to use the lot to further diversify Aggieville.

"This is a step in the right direction and a positive move to attract a different clientele to the area," Wilson said. "I want to bring a diversity of stores, not further increase the area with bars."

Simon says he wasn't forced to change station's schedule

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mandated changes in programming at KSDB-FM 91.9 were not the result of pressure from Black Student Union or any other minority group, said Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

On Thursday, Simon mandated that "Jam the Box," an urban music show on K-State's student run radio station, be rescheduled to air from 8 p.m. to midnight.

"Nobody told me what to do," Simon said. "As licensee, I have to weigh everyone's interests in the community."

He said he made the decision after listening to arguments from both sides and that there should have been more communication between minorities and the station before a change was made in the first place.

"I had several reasons why I made this decision," he said. "But the key fact is that we should have talked with minorities before changing the program time, and we failed to do that."

Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost for multicultural affairs, said she put no pressure on Simon to mandate the change and said it was insulting to suggest that he had to be pressured to come to his decision.

"Pressure is not needed, because Todd is a leader," Taylor-Archer said. "When you ask if he was pressed, you're not giving Todd Simon credit for his decision. Simon should be commended

KSU Telefund raises $308,270 through 1st week of collection

■ Student volunteers push colleges toward goals.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is on its way to providing many students with scholarship money for the 1999-2000 school year.

Gordon Dowell, director of the annual giving, said during the first week, the KSU Foundation Telefund raised $308,270 with the help of student volunteers from the colleges of Engineering, Education and Veterinary Medicine.

Dowell said the Telefund room has a maximum capacity of 80 callers, and about 75 was the average each night last week.

"The first year I worked here we raised $338,000 during the entire month," Dowell said. "We have just raised that in one week. If we were a business and showed that much growth, we would be very successful."

The number of nights each college has to call and raise money is based on how many alumni that particular school has. The largest, the College of Arts and Sciences, has nine nights and the smallest, K-State-Salina, has one.

Jan Wissman, associate dean of the education college, said volunteers have four nights to raise money for the education college. During the first night, 40 students donated time, and 80 are signed up for the next two nights. An estimated $15,000 was raised the first night, with the goal for the college's Telefund set at $80,000.

"The students really enjoyed doing it," Wissman said. "Some had some interesting conversations with alumni, and most concluded that they were glad they chose the teaching profession and Several rugby players work to pass the ball on the ground Thursday during practice at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Although it is more common in Ivy League schools than in the Midwest, rugby has a place at K-State. Members of the K-State Women's Rugby Club and the Kansas State University/Fort Riley Rugby Football Club said they have found the sport has camaraderie and can be an outlet for aggression.

"It's been such a male-dominated sport since it's aggressive," Jennifer Eicher, sophomore in economics, said. "Girls are pre-programmed and pushed away from being aggressive, but it will teach you."

Because of the sport's rarity in the United States, many rugby players learn the game as they go.

"Who grows up playing rugby in the U.S.?" said Chris Sorensen, professor of physics and faculty adviser for both the men's and women's clubs. "You have to be a little patient with yourself. It can be a humbling sport, but everyone pretty much starts at the same level."

Most club players have little or no exposure to rugby before attempting to play.

Kansas economy benefits from Fort Riley activities

Fort Riley pumped more than $500 million into the Kansas economy in the 1998 fiscal year, according to its yearly economic impact statement released two weeks ago.

The military post had an economic effect of $556,166,189 last year, according to the statement. Military payroll accounted for the largest portion of the total at $451,575,127.

Deb Skidmore, Fort Riley's public information officer, said military payroll, combined with the stabilization of the post's troop population, are the biggest factors in the local economies of Manhattan and Junction City.

"Money is turned over to the economies in the form of paychecks," Skidmore said. "Now that the reorganization of the Army is beginning to take full effect, our troop size is beginning to stabilize and the local economies are beginning to reap the benefits."

Fort Riley has seen its troop size remain near 10,000 soldiers during the past three years (1996 — 9,939, 1997 — 10,269, 1998 — 10,256). Skidmore said she believes the troop population will remain steady as long as the government does not choose to realign again in the near future.

Supplies, services and contracts accounted for $66,817,420, while construction payments totaled $20,908,840 in 1998. Skidmore said the post brings in several job contracts and civilians to do the construction each year. Those factors, just as with military payroll, have an effect on the local economies in the form of paychecks and money spent.

Health-care facilities ($9,127,312) and schools ($7,712,870) in the surrounding areas also feel the presence of the post. Students from Fort Riley make up 61 percent of Junction City USD 475 and 10 percent of Manhattan-Ogden USD 383.

David Bossemeyer, acting director of the Junction City Chamber of Commerce, said he was not surprised by the statement's content.

"It was pretty much what I expected," Bossemeyer said. "The report shows Fort Riley has a massive impact on our city and the state of Kansas. The population figures alone account for a tenth of our population base, and that has a huge impact economically."

Fort Riley was established in 1853 and is located between Manhattan and Junction City. The post consists of the 1st Brigade of the 1st Infantry Division, the 3rd Brigade of the 1st Armored Division and 937th Engineer Group. The total population of Fort Riley, both military and civilian, is 42,083.

Skidmore said the economic report should send a clear message to the citizens of Kansas.

"I think the biggest message the statement sends is how important Fort Riley is to the state of Kansas," Skidmore said. "Not everyone realizes how important Fort Riley is, or they are just not aware of it."

79-year-old man charged with murder after beating

LEAWOOD, Kan. — A 79-year-old man was charged Monday with murder in the beating of an elderly couple after one of the victims died over the weekend.

Francis Patrick Doyle was charged with the murder of 77-year-old Lawrence Kubik, who died Saturday of injuries suffered during the attack last Thursday.

Marguerite Bacher-Kubik, 77, Kubik's childhood sweetheart who married him in November, was hospitalized in fair condition.

If convicted, Doyle would face a minimum of 25 years in prison. Johnson County District Attorney Paul Morrison said the state would not seek the death penalty because of Doyle's age. He is being held on $2 million bond.

"It's just kind of a strange deal, one of those weird love-triangle situations," Morrison said.

Doyle, of Prairie Village, is accused of sneaking into the couple's nearby Leawood home and beating Kubik with a baseball bat while he slept in his bedroom. Bacher-Kubik was able to call 911 from a bathroom telephone before she was attacked.

Police found Doyle holding a bat inside the couple's home.

James Anderson, who represented Doyle at his first court appearance Friday, had described Doyle Saturday as "very concerned and very considerate" about the couple's condition.

Doyle also is charged with burglary and attempted murder.

Kansas leaders pay tribute to former baseball great

TOPEKA — Kansas leaders, lawmakers and fans paid tribute Monday to Hall of Fame baseball star George Brett, lauding him as an adopted son whose playing career, charitable work and character have enhanced the state's image.

Gov. Bill Graves led the tribute during a joint session of the Legislature, as the state poured accolades on the Kansas City sports icon for his election to the hall in his first year of eligibility.

Graves referred to Brett as "one of our adopted Kansans who has chosen to live in our state, whose wife, Leslie, is a Kansan, and who has chosen to raise his three sons in Kansas."

Graves told Brett that being voted into the Hall of Fame, "means you will forever be recognized ... among the greatest players who ever played the game."

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

Due to a reporter's error, an article in Monday's Collegian about the KSDB-FM 91.9 privilege fee proposal contained several mistakes.

The original operating budget proposal presented two weeks ago was $50,466. The revised proposal adjusted the original for salary increases and resulted in $51,332.

An amendment proposed Sunday would not attach student-control stipulations to the funding. The amendments will not go before the Privilege Fee Committee next Sunday, unless they are specifically put on the agenda or if a committee member seeks to add them with a motion.

There is no FCC licensing agreement for KSDB. There are, however, FCC regulations regarding noncommercial, educational radio stations.

The committee did not pass a motion to allocate money out of reserve accounts. It passed a motion to write a bill that would do that. The bill then would be discussed by Student Senate.

The station is licensed to the Kansas Board of Regents, but it has nothing to do with the operations of KSDB or any other station licensed to them.

Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, is not acting KSDB station manager.

The bill before the committee was not newly amended.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

If you see something that should be corrected, call Joe Hurla at 532-6556 or e-mail collegn@ksu.edu.

THE JOB INTERVIEW: 5 shocking truths that can help you nail your dream job

Paid advertisement

Let's face it. Nobody looks forward to job interviews. A total stranger stares you down for an hour while you sit there uncomfortably in your pantyhose, trying to sound super-intelligent while also remembering to keep your legs crossed correctly. While you'd prefer to avoid thinking about the whole thing, and just get through it when the time comes - Don't! Here are a few "insider" insights about the whole process that may shock you, but can help you better connect with your interviewer and distinguish yourself from the competition.

1. RESUMES ARE OBSOLETE

Well, they're not really obsolete, but they are only one piece of the job puzzle. "Most people spend much more time on their resume than they do preparing for each interview. That's a huge mistake," says Bruce Tulgan, the author of Work this Way, a book about how to thrive in your first few jobs. "People can easily lie on resumes. The interview is much more important, which is why recruiters spend so much time doing them - and why you should spend time getting ready."

What to do:

- Think about all the time you will spend on your job search; then, carve out a chunk of those hours to prep for your interviews.

2. WORK EXPERIENCE NOT REQUIRED

Okay, so you may not have a ton of real work experience. But that's not what recruiters are really looking for when they are hiring new college grads. Believe it or not, the very fact that you are young can be worth a lot to many companies. They're in search of a 22-year-old's energy and fresh perspective. You may have a whole new way of looking at things, and that's invaluable to most companies. "Frankly, experience is not very important to us," says Tom Scott, co-founder of Nantucket Nectars, a booming small beverage company with current annual sales over $50 million. "We can teach you to do the things you need to do here. What we're looking for is hunger." As Scott suggests, entry-level job interviews are not designed to weigh your experience, they're supposed to measure your smarts, enthusiasm, personality and passion.

What to do:

- Instead of just describing your past summer jobs, focus on stories that showcase your energy and passion for the activities you really care about. Or, talk about how your leadership has made a difference. While your examples may be summer jobs, they may also be a concert you organized, a paper or project for a favorite class, or a team sport that you play. Make it clear that you will be just as hungry and passionate about the job for which you are interviewing.

3. GOOD QUESTIONS, NOT GOOD ANSWERS CAN CLOSE THE DEAL

Most people spend time preparing answers that will showcase their intelligence, savvy and interest in a company. This is important. But preparing some thoughtful, well-researched questions can accomplish the same thing - and often with greater impact! When the interviewer gets around to "Any questions?" (and he or she will), that's your chance to strut any stuff that you haven't been asked about during the course of the interview. What you stand out you need to arm yourself with current and substantive information about the company and industry. Thanks to today's technology, this does not have to be a daunting or time-consuming proposition. You can learn a lot with minimal effort and make a great impact because most other undergrad candidates won't take the extra step.

What to Do:

- Read the newspaper! See what's happening in the world that might be relevant to the respective company or industry.
- Call and ask for a company's sales materials to see how they talk to their customers.
- Use on-line info like company or news web sites. Sites like www.wefteetpress.com and www.vaultreports.com carry great company and industry profiles for sale.
- Utilize free news information resources at your school library like Lexis/Nexis or the Bloomberg News Service.

5. FUN, NOT FACTS MAY MAKE THE DIFFERENCE

Probably the most important piece of information a recruiter will want to know but will never ask directly is "What is this person like to be around?" A good recruiter knows you will be working some long hours in a closed room with other people. You better believe that a key question on his or her checklist is "Do I want to work with this person? Would my colleagues want to work with this person?" Let's face it, many people will have the same skills as you, but not everyone can package those skills with your personality. You want the recruiter to walk away wanting to work with you!

What to Do:

- Make sure pieces of YOU come out in the interview! Be confident about yourself, and communicate with energy and enthusiasm. Don't be afraid to laugh when appropriate or talk about a personal issue to make a relevant point.

Stovall wants tougher DUI laws

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

New legislation has been recommended by the attorney general's office to make laws tougher on people convicted of driving under the influence.

The legislation came out of a task force created by Attorney General Carla Stovall last June. The task force, called the Far-Reaching Alteration of Traffic and Alcohol Laws, came up with recommendations that would create stricter penalties for people, including minors, convicted of DUIs.

House Judiciary Chair Mike O'Neal, who sponsored the zero-tolerance bill for minors last year, said if introduced as a bill and passed, the legislation would make it a criminal offense for minors who get a DUI.

Right now, minors receive an administrative sanction — action taken on their driver's license — if they are driving and have a blood-alcohol level of .02 or above.

"The criminal aspect of it would be a fine or the jail sentence that goes along," O'Neal said.

There are questions of the constitutionality of a law that makes it easier to prosecute minors for driving drunk because it uses a lower blood-alcohol measure.

Persons of legal drinking age are measured against a blood alcohol level of .08 or above.

According to the Atlanta Journal and Constitution, Attorney Lee Fitzpatrick said Georgia's DUI laws interfere with the constitutional right of fairness in the criminal process. He said it's unconstitutional to force one group of DUI defendants against a lower level of proof than another group of DUI defendants.

O'Neal said it doesn't surprise him the first minor to get hit with that law would make the claim of it being unconstitutional.

If a bill like that is passed in Kansas and is challenged for its constitutionality, O'Neal said the challenge probably would be unsuccessful.

A state can discriminate between different groups if the state can show a compelling reason to treat the two groups differently, he said.

"The difference is that for those over 21, possession of alcohol is not a crime," he said. "But, for those under 21 the mere possession of alcohol is a crime. Therefore, any amount found in their system is illegal."

"We already have an administrative sanction for .02 level, so I don't think adding a criminal sanction with it will be a problem," O'Neal said.

Tiffany Ball, spokesperson for Stovall's office, said Stovall also wants a person's license revoked for life after a fifth DUI conviction. There is no such penalty now.

"She thinks that at some point they shouldn't get their license back," Ball said.

She said Stovall also is pushing for only one diversion in a lifetime. Right now, a person can get another diversion if convicted of a DUI five years after their first conviction.

Another penalty Stovall would like to see enhanced is one for offenders driving under the influence with a child of less than 14 years old in the vehicle, Ball said.

"The penalties and fines you have to pay really doesn't deter a whole lot, and that's what she's trying to do is reverse that," she said.

Stovall's task force also is recommending that keg registration be required upon purchase.

According to a press release from the Office of the Attorney General, "More than a 100 people in Kansas are killed each year in drunk driving crimes, and more than 2,700 are injured. And, actually drunk-driving is the number one cause of injury nationwide of young people."

"Our goal is to hold accountable those who violate state law by driving under the influence of drugs or alcohol and to protect the innocent people who share our streets and highways with those drivers."

Sorority sponsors movie night for club

By JENNI LATZKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Delta Sigma Theta sorority, in conjunction with its Crimson and Cream Week and with Black History Month, is sponsoring a movie night at 5 p.m. today at the Manhattan Boys and Girls Club at 410 Houston St. There is no charge for the event, which is open to all youth ages 6 to 18.

Selected movies for the evening are "Small Soldiers" and "Antz."

This is the second time this school year the sorority has volunteered with the Boys and Girls Club. The sorority is sponsoring the movie night this semester in honor of the week, which its national organization has set aside for rededication of its founding goals and principles.

"Delta Sigma Theta is a group of college-educated women dedicated to public service and academic excellence," La Barbara Wigfall, Delta Sigma Theta adviser, said.

She said during Crimson and Cream Week, the sorority, which does year-round community service, puts forth a more concentrated effort to focus on each of the five goals of the organization. One of those goals is internal development, which focuses on betterment of members and service to the community. Tonight's movie night will focus on this goal.

"They held a movie night last semester, and we had about 65 kids show up," said Shelli Henry, interim executive director of the Boys and Girls Clubs.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH 1999
Remembering the Past
Forging the Future:
The Movement Continues

Henry was contacted by the sorority last semester, and she gave the members some ideas about what the clubs needed. The members suggested offering a movie night.

Teanikia Britton, senior in business management and member of Delta Sigma Theta, said the organization wanted to help out with clubs for a couple of reasons.

"One, we love children," she said. "And, two, a lot of us, when we were kids, loved people to come into the centers, and this just shows the kids that we are concerned about their well-being."

Britton said members of her group get a good feeling when they volunteer in the community. The sorority also has tutored at the Douglass Community Center and other local organizations.

Henry said the kids like meeting members of the organization.

"They really enjoy meeting new people. They are just fascinated by college students," she said.

She said there are benefits involved with volunteering for the group.

"For us, the benefit is getting the kids to meet and interact with other adults besides the usual staff," she said. "It also allows us to get the message out about the Boys and Girls Clubs."

Other activities that Delta Sigma Theta has planned for its Crimson and Cream Week include "Wayback Wednesday," a social event set for 7 p.m. Wednesday at Union Station. Everyone is invited to dress up in a '60s or '70s outfit and attend.

The sorority also will have a booth set up in the K-State Student Union on Thursday to register voters.

Radio format appeals to larger, more diverse crowd

Editor,

For the first time in two years, I actually listen to the campus radio station. For once, there is music to which the average student would listen. Not that I think "Jam the Box" is a bad program or that it should be taken off the air, but we can't change the format of the station every other week to please one campus organization or another.

Black Student Union isn't the only campus organization or the only minority group that should be heard. Dwain Archer said himself that success should not be gained at the expense of cultural or minority groups. Well, in that case, where is Polka Hour, and more importantly, where is country music?

If we really want to be fair to all of the cultural and minority groups on campus, we should think about what we are saying. This school is traditionally thought of as a "hick" school, but our campus radio station doesn't play country music.

For all of the complaining that has been going on, we have forgotten that for the first time in ages, there are people actually listening. This new format is appealing to larger audiences beyond the K-State campus.

We need to sit back and think: Are we just trying to please the loudest person in the room or should we be thinking about the silent majority? And for you, Todd Simon, grow a spine, don't make decisions because it's Black History Month and you don't want to look bad. Do what's right.

Increased rules single out bicycle community

Editor,

I applaud Mark Taussig, Phil Anderson, Parking Services, K-State Police, and other university officials and departments for their continued efforts to make K-State a more bicycle-friendly campus. As someone who cycles to campus every day the weather allows me, I appreciate the extra bike racks, wider traffic lanes, and other improvements that are making it easier for me to move around campus.

However, I don't appreciate the bicycle community being singled out for increased regulation, especially due to any perceived danger they might present to pedestrians. Two weeks ago, the campus police established a set of rules and guidelines for skates (especially inline skates) and skateboards. These modes of transportation were not banned from sidewalks — yet they can present just as much a danger to pedestrians as bicycles, if not more. Skaters blend in more with pedestrians, they can generally accelerate just as quickly as a bicyclist, approaching similar speeds. Any assumption that skaters present less of a danger to pedestrians than bicycles needs to be reconsidered.

Can bicyclists do a better job of conducting themselves? Sure they can. Wear a helmet. Make eye contact with everyone around you, whether they're driving, walking, riding, or skating. When approaching someone from behind, let them know you're there, whether it's a bell, horn, whistle, vocal greeting, whatever. And most importantly... slow down!

I'll thank the university again for their support, but they can keep their double standards.

Black History Month should not cause radio change

Editor,

I am writing in regard to the article "JMC Director Orders KSDB Programming Change" featured on the front page of the Collegian on Friday, Feb. 5. I am happy to have read that "Jam the Box" will be returned to DB92 at a decent hour.

I am not writing to complain about the writer, but I do have a few things to say about some of Jeremy Claeys' comments. He said that "the time was changed to better fit with the modern rock format, not to get rid of urban music programming on the station." Whose decision was it to make the format modern rock? I am not going to use music and who listens to which particular type of music together, but what about the audience of DB92 in general? Listeners of urban music like to listen to that particular type of music during the day when they turn on the radio. This university is supposed to be diverse in all aspects, but when we turn on our radios, we still hear diversity.

He also said that "Hip-hop, R&B and other types of urban music are popular at night when people go out." Between 11 p.m. and 3 a.m. during the week, myself and others are usually in the bed asleep. No one is listening to music, unless they are studying. If we do go out on the weekend, we are in the club or at a party during that time slot. That time slot does not benefit the listeners of urban music. During the week or on the weekend, we still miss out on listening to "Jam the Box."

Finally his last comment saying, "I think that at any other time, Simon would have stood up for student media rights on campus. It just happens to be Black History Month and the 30th Anniversary of the Black Student Union at K-State, and there were threats at some meetings by BSU to protest." I can't believe that these two important occasions and threats to protest were the reasons for Mr. Simon to override the decision. If this were the case, I wouldn't want to listen to this radio station.

Black History Month is only one month out of 12 in a year that African-Americans are recognized for their contributions to this nation. For me, Black History Month is every month. It is a time to recognize and love myself and community, to learn our history, to overcome our struggles, to succeed, and time for education. BSU is the voice of the African-American community on this predominately white campus and is here so we can feel comfortable.

Regardless of what occasion is going on at the present time, the urban music audience was upset at the format change.

It doesn't have to be Black History Month, Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday, or the 30th Anniversary of BSU for change to be made.

K-State student chooses values over sophistication

Editor,

Reading Becky Guthrie's whinings about Manhattan and K-State reminded me precisely why I chose K-State over KU, despite the fact that it meant turning down enough additional scholarship money to buy a BMW.

Out of the many factors which caused me to choose K-State (the College of Engineering, academic reputation, loyalty), one of them was the fact that this university still seems to be clinging to the remnants of those values which made America great, and which KU so prides itself on tearing down.

I'll admit, Manhattan does offer less to do than Lawrence, since it is about half as big. But if drinking is the only thing to do here, why do more KU students binge drink (60 percent) than K-State students (about 25 percent)? If Lawrence is the cultural capital of Kansas, why is it primarily known for perverse sexual activity and illegal drugs?

While Lawrence residents and students flatter themselves with their cultural "sophistication" and their support for extreme liberal causes, we in Manhattan are busy getting an education so that we can do something real with our lives.

Maybe Miss Guthrie should transfer to KU and end her regret, but I have never regretted turning down all that money to come to K-State. Manhattan and K-State have their faults, but overall I'm proud to be a student here.

Volunteers improve quality of community with project

Editor,

How does one begin to say thank you for having such a tremendous effect on a community? On Jan. 18, more than 180 volunteers from the K-State, Manhattan, Fort Riley and Junction City areas dedicated themselves to improving quality of life in Manhattan through the Martin Luther King Jr. Community Service Project.

Throughout the day, fifth and sixth grade students learned about helping the environment at the Sunset Zoological Park, while their classmates found themselves appreciating their elders at several retirement communities. Students and community members painted, cleaned apartments, raked leaves and organized offices, while others attended exercise classes, made valentines and read books. Habitat for Humanity found volunteers ready to pound nails and put up roofs. What a difference a couple of hours can make!

On behalf of the Kansas State University Martin Luther King, Jr. Observance Week Committee, I am proud to say thank you. Thank you for giving your time, for making an impact in our community and for keeping Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s dream alive.

Love him or hate him, Mike Tyson story never dull

"I have to transcend my whole characteristic." — Mike Tyson

Iron Mike said this before his Francois Botha fight. Tyson won the fight on a fifth round knockout, making his record in the '90s 9-3. It now looks like that's how his record will stay. He was sent to jail for a year after a bad case of road rage in Maryland.

Tyson pleaded no contest in the case after paying his victims not to press charges. The judge sentenced him to five months in the pokey, with the remainder of the time to be served in a halfway house.

The members of the sports-entertainment media relishes a figure like Tyson. He's unpredictable. He's fearless. He gives ridiculously great quotes.

"He knows what I do. I put people in body bags." — Tyson on what he would do to Botha.

There is also another side to Tyson, lately a more tragic story than an entertaining one.

The man who used to be the "baddest man on the planet" has to constantly reinvent himself.

He's got to sell himself over and over. He's the fallen champion. The basis and track for a loose cannon, a man gone awry.

Back in the late '80s, no one wanted to face Tyson. His punching power, speed and style were unparalleled in his time. He was short, stocky and mean. Now, he's just plain mean.

Tyson was the butt of many jokes and rightly so. He was a tough boxer dating a celebrity (Robin Givens), and he said some outrageously dumb things with a high voice and a lip that made him an easy target for parody.

Of course, there was also that little incident with Evander Holyfield's ear, which is a movie-in-waiting.

Teddy Atlas, the man who was once Tyson's trainer in the early days of Tyson's career, made one of the most outstanding predictions in sports history. The night before the Tyson/Holyfield fight, once Tyson realized he couldn't beat Holyfield, he would do look for a way to lose that would somehow make him a hero.

VIEWPOINT

CRANE

Atlas said, "Tyson might bite his ears off." Of course, this is coming from the man who once held a gun to Tyson's ear until he bled, and when Tyson laughed, he shot it off near his ear and was removed from the camp of Tyson's first trainer and hero Cus D'Amato.

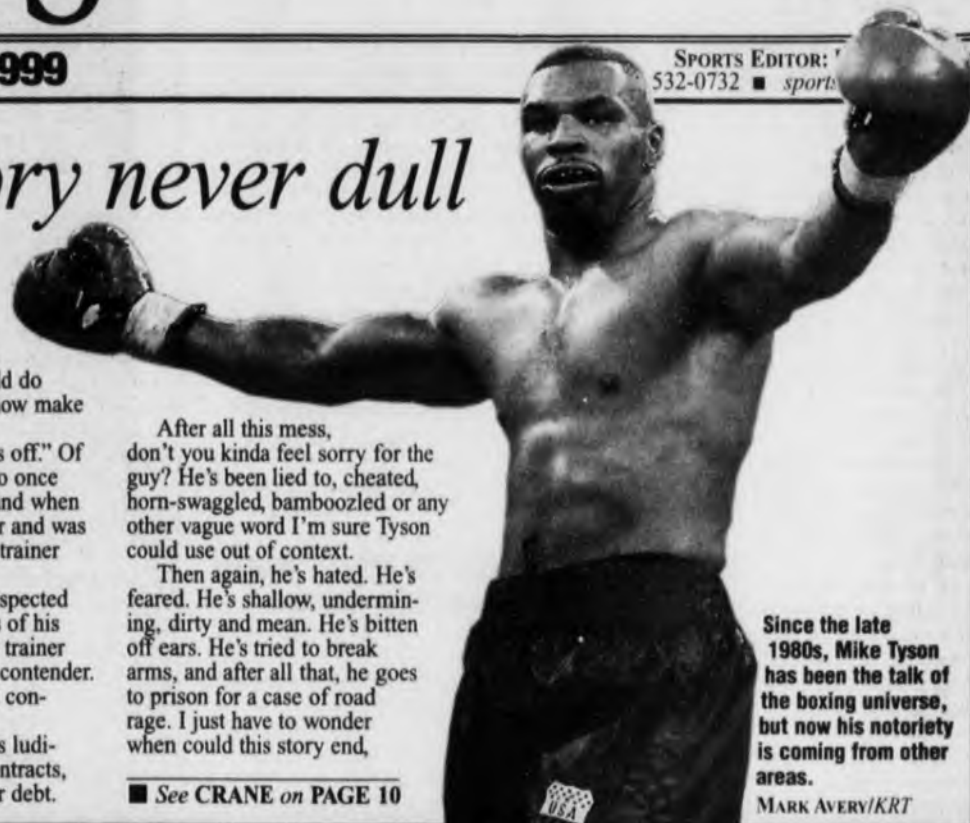

D'Amato was the only man Tyson respected and looked at as a hero in the early days of his fighting career. D'Amato is a legendary trainer and helped Tyson establish himself as a contender. The trouble began once Tyson became a contender.

Don King finished Tyson off with his ludicrous management and overweighted contracts, which put Tyson into multimillion-dollar debt.

After all this mess, don't you kinda feel sorry for the guy? He's been lied to, cheated, horn-swaggled, bamboozled or any other vague word I'm sure Tyson could use out of context.

Then again, he's hated. He's feared. He's shallow, undermining, dirty and mean. He's bitten off ears. He's tried to break arms, and after all that, he goes to prison for a case of road rage. I just have to wonder when could this story end.

the long road to the BIG DANCE

Women's basketball team, coach hoping for NCAA Tournament berth

BY JON BALMER

At a university that stresses higher learning and open-minded thinking, the K-State women's basketball team has taken up a decidedly limited mind set in order to achieve success.

With four of the Cats' six remaining Big 12 Conference games against ranked opponents and three difficult road dates, head coach Deb Patterson's decision to avoid thinking of postseason possibilities and focus on one game at a time could be the key to landing an at-large berth in the NCAA Tournament.

Facing what she said she believes to be the toughest schedule in the conference, Patterson has stressed the importance of focusing only on the task at hand in order to reach overall success.

"I think we're very next-game oriented," she said. "You have to respect that task ahead of you. Every game is the most significant one."

Patterson's message couldn't have been illustrated any better than Saturday night, when the Cats shook off a poor Jan. 31 outing against KU and knocked off Colorado 59-57.

With an 11-game losing streak in Boulder and a pending Wednesday night matchup at home against No. 15 Iowa State, K-State could have lost focus easily after falling behind by nine points late in the game. But the team kept its poise, and Kristin Rethman's three-pointer with 2.3 seconds remaining sealed the victory.

"I feel the difference was the competitive determination that our team brought to the floor," Patterson said. "I felt like that game truly defined team victory and competitive effort."

That effort ended a two-game slide and evened K-State's record in the Big 12 at 5-5, 12-8 overall. With the Cats now tied for fifth in the conference with Nebraska, Rethman said their big win in Boulder should help to erase the team's previous poor outings.

"We've been kind of up and down," she said. "We are playing better in the last couple of practices, and the Colorado game was just what we needed."

Entering the final stretch of the basketball season, K-State has the added task of making a run without a "go-to player," often a veteran team member willing to carry the team to victory based on performance and leadership.

After losing senior Jenny Colson to injury only one game into the season, Patterson has relied on a number of different players to step up and guide the Cats. This might appear to be the team's weak point, but Patterson said that it has solidified the team on and off the court. "The leadership has been very versatile and has come from a lot of different players," she said. "It's been an evolution by virtue of need."

"You're going to have different players thrust into roles early on, and you have to plan on stepping up and leading by example. Do we have one true leader? No. We have leadership by committee," Patterson said.

The ability to find a different leader on any night has been the key to Patterson's young team achieving victory. From the steady play of juniors Angie Finkes and Nicky Ramage to the surprising presence of freshmen Essence Perry and Rethman, Patterson said the team's potential could spark a late-season run.

"I expect our team will continue to get better in February," she said. "You cannot stay where you're at. There's too much basketball."

With the right attitude and a couple of breaks, Patterson said she felt the team could secure an NCAA bid with a 4-2 finish.

"If we finished 9-7 (in the Big 12), I would be sky-high," she said. "That could put us near the top, perhaps third or fourth in the conference."

Outside of the Cats' half-dozen conference games, the Big 12 Tournament could provide another opportunity to impress the NCAA Selection Committee. In Patterson's first season at K-State, the Cats' surge to the Big 12 title game resulted in an at-large berth, the school's first in 10 seasons.

This season, however, a four-game run might prove to be an extremely difficult task due to the strength of the Big 12. Ranking the conference in the top three with the Southeastern Conference and the Atlantic Coast Conference, Patterson said the league's parity could result in a number of upsets.

"(The No. 12 seed) could play one the first day, and who knows?" she said. "And that's not to demean the quality of basketball at the top. It really is just a compliment to the depth of the league."

This symmetry throughout the conference could result in a number of bids for the Big 12, a testament to the school's ratings, strength of schedule and quality of basketball.

"I think every coach in this league will be beside themselves if this league doesn't get at least six teams in the NCAA Tournament," Patterson said. "I would take our top nine or 10 teams, and I would play them against 20 or 30 of the teams that win conference championships across the country and expect the Big 12 to win."

Baseball team salvages 1 win in Showdown in the Desert

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The K-State baseball team capped off its three-game opening weekend at the Showdown in the Desert in Peoria, Ariz., on Sunday with one win and two losses.

The Wildcats fell to Oregon State 13-6 in the season opener on Friday. The loss left the Cats with an 8-5 mark in opening contests under current head coach Mike Clark.

K-State fell behind early, with the Beavers scoring three runs in the first inning and one apiece in the second and third innings. Wildcat starting pitcher senior Brandon Peck took the loss as he threw four innings and allowed five runs, four of which were earned.

"Brandon just didn't pitch up to his standards," junior second baseman Chad Tabor said. "We all know he'll bounce back."

Tabor paced K-State offensively, going three for five with a double, one RBI, two runs scored and a stolen base.

The Cats battled San Diego State on Saturday in a close contest but fell 10-7 to start the season 0-2.

Starting senior Derek Andersen made his Wildcat debut and allowed 10 hits and eight runs, all earned, while pitching four innings. He finished the game with the loss as well as four strike outs and no walks.

The Cats committed three errors in the game which contributed to the Aztecs scoring six runs in the first two innings.

"With Derek pitching, we just played bad defense," Clark said. "He could have walked out of there with only four runs allowed."

K-State got off to a quick start, scoring three runs in the first inning. Freshman shortstop Kyle Boyer led the game off with a double, then Tabor sacrificed him home. Freshman third baseman Brett Reid then reached base on a passed ball before senior right fielder Quinn Cravens blasted his first home run of the season, a two-run shot.

The Wildcats returned to the field on Sunday and walked away with a 7-6 victory over Oregon State for their first win of the year.

K-State was helped by a strong performance from junior starting pitcher Jason Wells. Wells pitched four strong innings, allowing six hits and only one earned run while striking out three and walking three.

"There's not a lot to say about Jason," Tabor said. "He just threw a gem on Sunday."

Tabor again led the Cats on the offensive side, reaching base on four of five plate appearances and scoring two runs. Tabor finished the tournament 7 for 12 at the plate with four runs and an RBI. The hitting performance for Tabor is much improved over last season, when he struggled at the plate, hitting only .163 in 135 at-bats.

"I played summer ball in Topeka, and it made me realize that I couldn't pull every pitch," Tabor said. "Now I know how to hit to all fields."

Clark said he was impressed overall by his team's performance, taking into account that this is the beginning of the season and new players are being tried at new positions.

"We were in two of the three games," Clark said. "On Sunday, we showed the mental toughness of this team because we came out and beat a good Oregon State team."

"Sometimes a team will let a loss a few days earlier carry over, but we didn't do that," Clark said.

The Wildcats will travel to Clemson for a three-game series this weekend before returning home to play five straight games vs. York and Air Force.

Snyder says football recruiting becoming high-pressured war

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Don't expect to find copies of any recruiting magazines on Bill Snyder's coffee table any time soon.

Among other issues discussed at the press conference to announce this year's recruiting class, Snyder lamented the increasingly high-tech, high-pressure atmosphere that has surrounded college recruiting in the form of ever-increasing numbers of recruiting journals and Web sites.

"Everybody is more sophisticated about this recruiting thing," Snyder said. "It's astounding, and I don't think that it's all necessarily good."

"I think there are a lot of things said on the Internet — anyone can get on and cast an opinion. Kids can get a misperception of their self-worth when they read so many things

Arguments end in Senate trial

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — House prosecutors argued their last stand against President Clinton on Monday, challenging skeptical senators to "cleanse the office" by convicting him on impeachment counts of perjury and obstruction of justice. Clinton's lawyer dismissed the case as a dark vision of Republican retribution.

"A failure to convict will make the statement that lying under oath, while unpleasant and to be avoided, is not all that serious," chief prosecutor Henry Hyde said.

The Illinois Republican was scathing in rebutting defense claims that the House prosecutors had wanted "too badly to win." None of them, he said, "has committed perjury nor obstructed justice nor claimed false privileges. None of us has hidden evidence under anyone's bed nor encouraged false testimony before the grand jury."

"That's what you want to do if you want to win too badly."

Earlier in a final summation for the defense, White House Counsel Charles F.C. Ruff launched a sharp attack on the Republican prosecutors. They are, he said, "more focused on retribution, more designed to achieve partisan ends, more uncaring about the future we face together."

Referring to the prosecutors' claims of "seven pillars of obstruction," he ridiculed them for building their case on "shifting sand castles of speculation."

A two-thirds majority is required to find Clinton guilty and automatically remove him from office. Even Republicans concede that won't happen, and some GOP senators have suggested that — particularly on the perjury charge — it is possible a majority of the Senate might vote to acquit. The charges stem from Clinton's sexual relationship with Monica Lewinsky and his efforts to conceal it.

The final presentations — three hours for each side in the historic trial — marked the end of the argument phase in the four-week trial. Beginning today, senators will deliberate on Clinton's fate with final votes on the articles of impeachment expected on Thursday or Friday.

Prospects for opening final deliberations to the public faded during the day, when Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., announced his opposition. "It's going to be hard to meet the two-thirds hurdle" needed to open the doors, conceded Texas Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a supporter of open debate.

While the outcome of the trial seemed sure, House prosecutors showed they intend to fight to the end.

Hyde asked Senate leaders to approve three subpoenas for people who have cast doubt on sworn testimony that White House aide Sidney Blumenthal gave in the trial last week. Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said Democrats were prepared to object if any GOP senator sought approval for the request. "We don't need additional witnesses," he said at the end of the day.

Blumenthal has denied feeding reporters a story — attributed ultimately to Clinton — to the effect that Lewinsky had told the president she was known as "the stalker" and that she had made a sexual demand on him.

In sworn affidavits in recent days, freelance journalist Christopher Hitchens and his wife, Carol Blue, said Blumenthal had told them at a lunch in March 1998 that Lewinsky was known as a stalker.

The controversy over Blumenthal's testimony appeared to have little direct effect on the trial itself, where it has been clear Clinton has enough support to win acquittal on both articles of impeachment.

Hyde read aloud from a Democratic draft censure proposal to condemn Clinton in the strongest possible terms.

Not quite, he said. Censure would be "the next strongest possible terms," second to conviction and removal from office.

"Do you really cleanse the office as provided in the Constitution or do you use the Air Wick of a censure resolution?" he asked.

Farmers' fertilizer stolen for meth

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — There is trouble down on the farm, legislators learned Monday. Thieves are stealing anhydrous ammonia, a staple as an agricultural fertilizer, to make the present drug of choice — methamphetamine.

Kansas Bureau of Investigation special agent Kyle Smith said the situation isn't expected to improve soon since meth makers are increasing their efforts this year.

"The anhydrous is normally stolen from farmers, causing damage to their equipment and risks to the rightful owners," Smith told the House Agriculture Committee. He said farmers might approach a tank in the field unaware of any valve damage.

Anhydrous ammonia is a liquid under pressure that can cause damage to the skin or to people who breathe it. It's a key ingredient in making meth, a cheap, addictive stimulant that produces a powerful high along with side effects such as paranoia.

He said farmers have reported an increase in theft of anhydrous, often by people who take it from a large farm tank and put it into a smaller container, like a tank normally used for propane grills or fire extinguishers.

"They don't care about farmers, or neighbors or anybody else," Smith told the committee. "You don't want to come across them while they are stealing the anhydrous. They are armed and dangerous. Who knows what can happen."

Kansas, California, Missouri and Iowa are among the top meth producing states, according to federal figures. Last year, Missouri enacted a series of strict laws to combat meth making in that state.

Smith said while that is good for Missouri, it means criminals are moving their operations to Kansas and other states where the laws against meth making aren't as strict.

K-State-Salina adds five planes to training fleet

By LORI OLEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five planes complete with custom purple and silver stripes have been added to K-State-Salina's fleet.

The new Cessna 172 Skyhawks, which will be used in the flight training program, have advanced instrument technology that is in full compliance with Instrument Flight Rules, said Peter Kennedy, interim head of the Department of Aviation.

"Students are going to be able to learn to fly with top-notch technology," he said.

"The planes allow students to be familiar with global positioning systems, which is a satellite-based navigation tool," Kennedy said.

The additions will help upgrade the current fleet that includes Cessna 150s, Beech Bonanzas, Beech Bonanzas, Beech Sundowners and a Beech King Air.

"Students will actually practice with aircraft that will likely be more advanced and better than what they will start out with after they complete the program and get their first jobs," said Roger Steinbrock, assistant director of college advancement.

Each plane costs around $144,000.

"We identified the need for newer planes and a more practical fleet for instrument training," Kennedy said. "In order to pay for the new ones, we sold a couple bigger planes, including a Bonanza and a Baron that we didn't have as much use for anymore."

Enrollment in the professional pilot program is about 135 and continues to grow.

Eighty-five of those students will fly the new planes regularly. The new Cessnas might help in further recruitment, Kennedy said.

"People who speak to us about our program usually ask what kind of planes we have," he said. "This type of equipment will bring people in."

Since starting an aviation bachelor's degree program in 1993, K-State-Salina continues to gain momentum.

"People are looking at us," Steinbrock said. "We have the facilities and the aircraft and are really competing now."

"We have the only bachelor's program in aviation in the state and the new planes are certainly an addition," he said.

K-State-Salina's planes, including the new Cessnas, all have custom purple and silver stripes and a Powercat logo on the tail that makes them easy to recognize, Steinbrock said.

"For those who bleed purple, it's a unique sight and makes people take notice of our aircraft," Kennedy said.

The planes arrived last week and were presented in a ceremony.

"The Salina area has been very supportive of what we do, so we wanted to give the local public a chance to see what we were up to," Kennedy said.

White House releases plan for fighting drugs, crime

By KEVIN GALVIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Releasing the administration's five-part strategy to fight drugs on Monday, Vice President Al Gore called for an "all-out effort to banish crime, drugs and disorder and hopelessness from our streets."

Despite the Clinton administration's promise to take a balanced approach in cutting the nation's drug problem in half by 2007, advocacy groups decried what they saw as a continued emphasis on law enforcement over prevention and treatment.

Administration officials said the plan continued to build on recent success in the fight against drugs, noting that government estimates show drug use by adults is at half what it was in 1979 and drug use by young people has started to decline.

"But when drug dealers still roam our streets and rob our children of their dreams and drug-related crime still ravages so many of our neighborhoods, we know that we have barely begun," Gore said. "We must do so much more."

The nationwide effort includes nearly $18 billion to be spent this year by the federal government. White House drug policy director Barry McCaffrey said he wants children to be the focal point for the drive against drugs.

The White House seeks to involve parents, coaches, mentors, teachers, clergy and other role models in a broad prevention campaign, McCaffrey said in the four-volume strategy sent to Capitol Hill on Monday.

The five parts of the administration plan are educating children, decreasing the addicted population, breaking the cycle of drugs and crime, securing the nation's borders from drugs and reducing the drug supply.

The blend of strategies is aimed at reducing the use and availability of drugs by 25 percent by 2002 and 50 percent by 2007.

Achieving the goal would mean just 3 percent of the U.S. population age 12 and older would be using illegal drugs. The current figure is estimated at 6.4 percent. In 1979, the rate was near 15 percent.

Some advocates said they were unconvinced that the administration's proposal did enough to boost treatment and prevention.

"Unfortunately, it's just another example of throwing billions of dollars down the bottomless pits of interdiction and failed prevention programs," said Ethan Nadelmann, director of the Lindesmith Center, a drug policy think tank funded by billionaire George Soros.

McCaffrey defended the administration's commitment to prevention, highlighting an advertising campaign that generates more than $195 million in matching contributions from media companies.

"If you take a three-year snapshot, we've increased prevention dollars by more than 40 percent," McCaffrey said. "If you look at drug treatment dollars, it's up 17 percent, and the FY 2000 budget continues that."

McCaffrey also trumpeted reduced coca cultivation in the Andean region, especially in Peru and Bolivia. However, cultivation in Colombia, where the product of the coca plant is used to produce cocaine, has risen 26 percent in just one year.

Gore said the fight against drugs was linked to a spiritual struggle for the hearts of the nation's youth and that education and adult role models were just as important as law enforcement.

"We must start by recognizing that our nation's drug problem was not born in isolation and does not exist in a vacuum," Gore said.

"It is an interconnected problem, and so our solutions must also be interconnected. We must mount an all out effort to banish crime, drugs and disorder and hopelessness from our streets once and for all," he said.

Opponents speak against concealed-handgun bill

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Opponents of a bill that would allow licensed Kansans to carry concealed handguns told a House committee on Monday the plan would jeopardize public safety and eliminate local control of guns.

"This concealed weapons legislation will kill our children," Karen O'Connor told the House Federal and State Affairs Committee during the hearing.

O'Connor is a volunteer for Safe State, a Wichita organization that is lobbying against the bill.

The bill would allow the Kansas Bureau of Investigation to issue licenses allowing people to carry concealed handguns starting Jan. 1, 2000.

Applicants would have to be 21 or older, complete a weapons safety and training course, have no felony convictions and have no history of mental illness or drug and alcohol abuse in the previous five years.

Gov. Bill Graves vetoed a similar bill in 1997, and Graves' spokesman, Mike Matson, has said the governor has not changed his position.

Rep. John Edmonds, R-Great Bend, questioned the wisdom of considering a bill in the face of another likely veto.

"We still have the same governor," Edmonds said. "Why are we doing this?"

Rep. L. Candy Ruff, the chief backer of the bill, said the issue is important enough to reconsider, even if the bill does not become law.

Supporters of the bill are scheduled to testify before the committee on Tuesday.

Many opponents of the bill objected to a provision that would preempt local concealed gun laws.

"The bill reduces the ability of local governments to control firearms," said Terri Moses, deputy chief of the Wichita Police Department.

Moses also said the bill would mean concealed handgun cases would have to be handled by district courts, which aren't set up to deal with them.

Moses disputed the notion of concealed weapons as a safety issue for women, an idea championed by Ruff and other supporters of the bill.

"There's not a female in this room that could carry a weapon," said Moses, referring to the dresses of the female legislators. "She would have to carry it in her purse. You cannot quickly remove a weapon from a purse."

Capt. Glenn Ladd of the Overland Park Police Department said the state's present gun law is permissive enough.

"Currently, we are able to possess firearms for sport or protection as long as they are not concealed," Ladd said.

"It's incredible the number of places you can carry a gun, as long as it's not concealed," he said.

Law-enforcement officials also questioned whether the safety and training course would be adequate.

"It's a mistake to assume the limited training will allow a citizen to draw a concealed weapon and use it successfully before a threatening criminal uses his or hers," Ladd said.

Midnight revelry enhances creativity

By NATHAN FOSSE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEAN

More than 100 people crowded into the Purple Masque Theatre to watch their peers perform in short plays Thursday night.

The event, "Midnight Madness," incorporates several original three- to 10-minute plays that are written by other students and performed by audience members on a voluntary basis. Anyone who wants to act may do so, and the show goes on regardless of the quality of each performance or sketch.

"It's kind of a happening, a playwright slam," Charlotte Macfarland, professor of theater, said.

Nathan Stanton, graduate student in theater and director of publicity for the event, said the event encompassed a variety of theatrical specialties.

"It's an original writing, an actor's workshop and theater reading all rolled into one," Stanton said.

Macfarland said she enjoyed the fast-paced nature of the event.

"It's wild and sort of a free-for-all. It gets people excited into writing. Nothing is censored. Anything goes," Macfarland said. "Students just come in and throw their scripts on stage. When the place gets full, we start. We never know who is going to read."

No subjects were censored, Macfarland said. The topics of the sketches submitted included proctology, lesbianism, a man who only sang rock lyrics and a mad-lib skit involving the audience yelling out certain words.

Stanton, who wrote the play "HMO Sapiens," said he liked "Midnight Madness" because of the freedom its participants have. "It's a nice opportunity to have original pieces heard," he said. "It's a completely open forum."

The late-night performance times were chosen because of the material's mature themes, Macfarland said, and because of this, anyone who is younger than college age is discouraged from attending.

Macfarland said she was inspired to begin "Midnight Madness" because of the influences she received from other universities.

She said this is only the third time the Department of Speech, Communication, Theatre and Dance has been host to "Midnight Madness," but the turnout has been more than she expected.

"I'm amazed at how people have liked it. We've filled the place to overflowing every time," she said. "At first, I thought we were only going to have 10 people, but it's been great."

Macfarland said she hasn't had to turn anyone away yet, although they have run out of seats. Macfarland said the event might be moved to Nichols Theatre for more space because of its popularity.

"The students want us to do it all the time, but we've held it back to make it more special," she said.

Macfarland said she hoped to get all students to come and propose themes for future events.

"We want this to be a place where anybody can write plays and it doesn't matter. It's not just for the theatre department," she said. "We want something cutting edge to bring to the theater department."

Macfarland said she hoped to coordinate "Midnight Madness" with other university events, such as game days and that she wants to keep the event free so students keep coming.

Chance Mullen, (left) freshman in theatre, and Vi Nhan Tran, freshman in theatre, act in a piece entitled "Anal Retentive" Thursday night during "Midnight Madness" in Purple Masque Theatre.

Society helps writers develop skills

■ Society of Creative Writers critiques writers' works, also accepts stories for publication.

By JUSTIN VANNEST
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEAN

K-State students with a flair and passion for creative writing can exercise their skills through a campus organization.

The Society of Creative Writers, which includes both students and faculty, is active in promoting the writings of its members.

Every week, the organization meets so members can discuss their literary works and to tap into other writers on campus.

At the meetings, members can participate in a variety of activities.

"When we have our weekly meeting, we discuss business," said Teresa Huffman, president of the SCW and sophomore in pre-health professions. "We also bring works to critique that we have just written or done for a class. We sometimes play games as well."

The SCW also has several activities in which it is involved, including an annual poetry contest it sponsors.

"We get submissions from everywhere," Huffman said. "We get them all the way from California."

The organization also is sponsoring a bowling tournament later this month for all clubs and organizations registered with the Office of Student Activities and Services. Each organization can sign up for a fee of $40 and has the opportunity to win $100.

Another main focus of the SCW is its new literary magazine, "The Paw Print," which was created late last semester.

The organization started the magazine as a way to publish the works of students and faculty at K-State. The first issue of "The Paw Print" came out in November, and the next will be available sometime this month, Huffman said.

The magazine takes submissions from anyone who is interested. Huffman said the magazine was developed for all lovers of literature at the university.

"The magazine was made for the works of K-State students, faculty and staff," Huffman said.

The staff of the magazine will accept most pieces, Huffman said.

"We are very open to submission," Huffman said. "As long as there is no problem with the stories, we won't reject anything."

The magazine is available only in Manhattan or by subscription. The cost is $1.50 per issue.

However, Huffman said, as the magazine becomes more developed and reaches a greater number of readers a change in the price is possible.

"That is the price we are charging now," Huffman said. "It might change, though. We are looking at expanding the magazine and other things."

Copies of "The Paw Print" are available at the K-State Union Bookstore, Varney's Book Store, The Dusty Bookshelf in Aggieville, and Hastings Books, Music and Video.

Anyone interested in submitting a work for the magazine or in getting a subscription to it can contact the Department of English.

For those interested in becoming members, the organization meets every week in the Union on alternating Sundays and Mondays.

Huffman said she established these diverse meeting times because they allow most members of the organization time to attend.

"We found that some people just could never attend if we held it on just one day," Huffman said.

'She's All That' brings fresh faces to screen in romantic tale

By JANNA GAEFNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEAN

For a movie with few actors who audiences will recognize, "She's All That" supplies viewers with faces that might become well-known on the big screen soon.

The movie, directed by Robert Iscove, focuses on a teen named Zack (Freddie Prinze Jr. of "I Know What You Did Last Summer" and the sequel, "I Still Know What You Did Last Summer"), a guy who thought he had the perfect car, clothes, grades and girlfriend.

Zack's perfect life, however, becomes tarnished when his girlfriend dumps him after a spring-break fling with an obnoxious ex-cast member of "The Real World."

In order to keep the respect of his peers and reassure himself he is still king of his high school, Zack accepts a bet that gives him only six weeks to turn the school nerd, Laney Boggs (Rachel Leigh Cook), into the prom queen.

Zack is even more surprised when he falls in love with Laney, who doesn't quite know what to think of her newfound popularity after the most popular boy in school starts to notice her. Despite her new looks, her reclusive attitude doesn't change.

Her attitude provides Zack with an unexpected challenge. He quickly learns turning Laney into the prom queen is much easier than trying to deny his love for her.

He continually tries to convince himself it was just a bet between friends and nothing more, but his whole world goes into a tailspin after his best friend decides to ask Laney to the prom.

Knowing the bad intentions his friend has planned for Laney, Zack has to come to terms with himself to get the girl he wants — by putting popularity aside.

Even though most of the actors in this film are new faces to the big screen, it was a job well done by all. Cook, for instance, is new to American films, although American audiences probably will start to see a lot more of her after this movie. She definitely gave the film style and added the extra bit of class it needed.

This high school flick provided everything one would expect "Beverly Hills 90210" style: heartache, deception and a happy ending. It had a heartwarming storyline about coming of age and young love.

This is a whirlwind romantic comedy with a few tears and tons of laughter. "She's All That" is a touching tale about the moment when a boy notices a girl for the first time and how a girl discovers her own true beauty.

4 U.S. presidents join in saluting King Hussein's work for peace

By TERENCE HUNT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMMAN, Jordan — Four U.S. presidents involved in a quarter-century search for peace in the Middle East bade farewell to a beloved ally Monday, standing together in tribute beside the casket of King Hussein.

Bill Clinton, George Bush, Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford joined an extraordinary array of world leaders in paying respects to the monarch who ruled Jordan for 46 years and was recognized as a steady voice of moderation in Arab-Israeli peacemaking. Jordanian officials said about 50 heads of state attended.

"Hussein really did bring people together," Clinton said. "People coming from all around the world, countries that are at each other's throat, here meeting in peace and friendship and the sanctity of the umbrella of this great man."

HUSSEIN

Clinton got a hug from ailing Russian President Boris Yeltsin. He chatted briefly with Syrian President Hafez el-Assad, a holdout to Middle East peace talks. He talked with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, Britain's Prince Charles and Prime Minister Tony Blair, France's President Jacques Chirac, Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak, Spain's King Juan Carlos and many others.

Clinton asked Assad to support Jordan, the only Arab nation other than Egypt to sign a peace accord with Israel. "Assad sort of said yes," said Sandy Berger, Clinton's national security adviser.

The U.S. presidents flew here overnight together on Air Force One, exchanging remembrances of the king and comparing notes on Russia, North Korea, the Middle East and Kosovo.

In a near-freezing cold, the four presidents and a crowd of dignitaries stood outside Raghadan Palace to enter the throne room where Hussein's casket rested. Later, they joined hundreds in a procession behind the caisson.

Hussein's horse, an Arab stallion named Amre, strode down the streets, a pair of boots backward in the stirrups, symbolizing the fallen horseman.

Clinton, Carter and Bush expressed confidence that Hussein's 37-year-old son, the newly crowned but politically untested King Abdullah, would follow the path of peace blazed by his father.

Carter recalled that King Hussein sought permission for Abdullah to attend all official U.S.-Jordanian discussions at the White House many years ago, when the boy was just 12.

After a 25-minute meeting with Abdullah, Clinton and the former president met with the staff of the U.S. Embassy. Clinton recounted his talk with the new king.

"He said in the most moving way ... 'I and all of my brothers and sisters have absorbed our father's teaching. We know what we are supposed to do, and I intend to do it.' And he said it in a way that exuded the quiet, humble confidence that I saw so often in his father," Clinton said.

Later, Bill Clinton spoke of the Israeli delegation and Hussein's ability to unify people.

"I looked at the Israeli delegation today. I could hardly believe my eyes," he told the U.S. Embassy staff. "All the candidates for prime minister were there. They were walking together."

"I don't know if they talk at home," Bill Clinton said, "but they were all talking here. I thought it was as if Hussein was hugging them all, you know?"

"I started last November, went to practice for two weeks and then went and played in a tournament," Maureen Bliss, freshman in Spanish, said. "Most people come in not even knowing what the ball looks like. I walked onto the field and didn't have a clue."

The men's club has about 30 players, and the women's club has about 25 players. Fifteen players make up a team.

"We're always recruiting," Stewart Keller, junior in graphic design, said.

Usually the women's club struggles to get players, but it has record numbers this semester after recruiting in the K-State Student Union and Derby Food Center.

Since the women's team is set up at the club level, it is not restricted to K-State students. The men's team has both club and collegiate levels.

"People who have not been in college full-time longer than five years from when they started are collegiate eligible," Keller said. "Club-side rugby can be played by anyone, and basically our nucleus is the club side."

Both clubs practice three days a week at the "slab," the area west of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and east of the KSU Stadium. The rugby team, along with lacrosse, soccer and Ultimate Frisbee clubs, used to practice where the new KSU Alumni Association is being built.

"We'd really like to get our own practice field and our own playing field, but we need to come up with money," Sorensen said. "There are a lot of sympathetic ears, but it takes money to take it all the way to a new field."

Not having a field has forced the rugby clubs to find an alternative place to play games. They now play at Tuttle Creek State Park.

"It means we have to pay to play at the state park, and then we have to pay to park, which deters getting some fans too," Natasha Belshe, senior in civil engineering, said. "Other schools have their own fields."

Both clubs are a part of the Heart of America Rugby Union, a national organization that regulates play and requires proof of insurance. Dues to join are $45 for one year.

Even though the sport is intense, rugby players find a friendly atmosphere.

Usually the women's club struggles to get players, but it has record numbers this semester after recruiting in the K-State Student Union and Derby Food Center.

"It's like a family," Eicher said. "Rugby players can hate each other on the field, but you walk away and everything is left on the field."

Many players used to be active in high school sports or enjoy contact sports, but anyone is encouraged to try.

"You don't have to have any athletic experience to play this, because you will fit in somewhere," Bliss said. "You don't have to be a certain height or a certain weight — anyone can play."

Both men's and women's clubs begin their spring schedules Feb. 27. The women play Pittsburg State University at home, and the men travel to Kirksville, Kan., to play Truman State University.

"People shouldn't be shy to come out," Sorensen said. "Most of us learn the game late in life, and once you get the enthusiasm for it, it's hard to get out of your blood."

for his leadership."

Jeremy Claeys, program manager at KSDB and junior in mass communications, said he thought there had been pressure from either Taylor-Archer or BSU.

Despite this, Claeys said he wanted to see the entire situation become a memory.

"I'd like to see this be behind me very soon," Claeys said.

One step towards putting it in the past was taken Monday when Claeys withdrew his funding proposal that asked for a student privilege fee, provided KSDB would be allowed to operate without interference.

"I withdrew it because it was in the best long-term interests of the station," Claeys said. "We'll proceed with finding an alternative route.

"With that proposal, there was a possibility that the station could be shut down."

Claeys said he wanted to keep the station operating, while trying to find a way to it recover financially, since it is more than $42,000 in debt.

He said he not only wanted to help the station out of debt but also wanted to increase the salary of the adviser/station manager, to make it more competitive.

Claeys became program manager in January, when the radio station became student-run.

Although it is primarily student-run, Simon said he still had the authority to step in and mandate a programming change.

"Since 1978, the FCC said that the licensee may not entirely delegate programming content to students," he said. "There is no legal principle of absolute student autonomy in radio."

Simon said although he does have the power to step in and control what goes over the airwaves, he does not over-use that power.

"This is the first time I've ever taken a position of interfering with content," Simon said. "I don't plan on getting in the habit."

Simon said he was aware his decision had stirred up controversy on campus.

"I realize people aren't happy," Simon said.

Taylor-Archer said she would not let the perception that she had exerted control over Simon deter her from speaking out in the future.

"I attended a couple of meetings but not all of them," Taylor-Archer said. "Any time concerns of diversity are issues, I am there."

not telemarketing."

Dowell said once the checks are received at the Foundation, they are deposited into each college's individual accounts. About 90 percent of the total amount of money is used for scholarships.

"Students from one college call the alumni from that college," Dowell said.

"It is the college's capability to determine how to use that money."

Wissman said all of the education college's money goes to scholarships, except for the costs of running the phones.

She said students sign up to help because they want to serve their college.

"This gives them the opportunity to connect with alumni who are already involved in the field," Wissman said. "It generates money for scholarships, and they do it to serve their college."

Dowell said first-week volunteers, about 300 students, have raised about $1,000 each by donating their time to help all of the students in their particular college.

"The Telefund benefits lots of students with the generosity of the alumni and the enthusiasm of the students working the phones," Dowell said.

The Telefund will continue through March 1.

about themselves. The whole process leaves a lot to be desired."

Snyder counted recruiting services as just another of the increasingly numerous parties with some stake in recruits' decisions.

"It's difficult because people are tugging on you all the time, and they're probably all people that you have some respect for," he said. "That's a big burden for young guys to carry around."

"Throw in your own family members, and they can tug on you as well," he said. "It's easy to see how young people can change their minds."

Following a recruiting season in which three players, tailback Jamar Mozee, linebacker Trey Whitlock, and wide receiver Anthony Johnson, verbally committed to K-State only to later renege, Snyder advocated the adoption of an early-signing period in football as a possible way to relieve the pressure on recruits to alter their decisions.

"I don't have a solution for it all," Snyder said. "I just know that when you're dead certain about what you want to do, and you do it, then it takes some of the pressure off from the people trying to alter your decisions."

NCAA News

The NCAA might be on the verge of handing down an official ruling in its investigation of Frank Murphy and K-State football, which dates back to last summer.

MURPHY

According to Snyder, preliminary word of the ruling is favorable in terms of recruiting for the Wildcats.

"From dialogue I've had, it would not have hurt us to have the final finding become public at an earlier time," he said. "What that all means, I can't tell you, but it didn't sound negative to me."

Sports Information Director Kent Brown said the length of the investigation is probably due to logistics and schedule conflicts within the NCAA and not necessarily because of any negative findings.

"Not at all. That's just the way the schedule works," Brown said. "You can't read one way or another into it."

2-Way Warrior

Snyder discussed the possibility of an impending position switch for defensive tackle Damion McIntosh to the offensive side of the ball. McIntosh will practice on both sides of the ball during spring practice and may wind up moving to offensive tackle, depending upon the success of junior college transfers Anthony Bates and Mario Fatafehi in providing depth at the defensive tackle slot.

"We need spring ball to look at Anthony, and we'll need August to look at Mario," Snyder said.

"If those things fall into place, then the intent will be to move Damion to offense."

Though primarily a defensive player, McIntosh has filled in at offensive tackle on many previous occasions. Switching McIntosh, a senior, would provide experience and depth to a position currently manned by sophomore Thomas Barnett and junior Milford Stephenson Jr., a converted center and tight end.

Due to inexperience and injuries, Barnett and Stephenson shuttled in and out of the lineup at left tackle last season before being replaced by the now-departed Ryan Young late in the year.

Eating His Wheaties

One of the Wildcats' more interesting recruits in this class could be 260-pound-plus tailback Joe Hall. The transfer from Palomar, Calif. Community College ran for 1,760 yards and 24 touchdowns as a sophomore last season.

Despite Hall's girth, Snyder is convinced that the lineman-sized runner is more than just a novelty.

"He is legitimate," Snyder said. "It will all depend on his weight. When he came here to visit he was 285, and I went out to see him not too long ago, and it had been awhile since he had seen 285."

"He could eat himself out of that position, but I don't think he will. He's played at 255 before and feels comfortable doing that," Snyder said.

"That's what his goal is right now, and I think he'll do it."

CRANE

and how?

He's been a WWF referee. His wife, Dr. Monica Turner, seems to be holding him together. The man almost can't be interviewed because of his love for profanity.

He truly is the man you love to hate. Shakespeare couldn't have created a more complex villain. He's evil, crude and ignorant. But there's also the Tyson who visited the premature babies in the hospital and the Tyson who asked to be alone with a child who had a brain tumor.

I can see the resentment for him. He's not an angelic man. I can see the love for him, everyone likes a good villain. It also seems society likes someone who is mentally deranged, e.g. Dennis Rodman, Marilyn Manson, etc.

Besides Muhammed Ali, who is a true hero, there isn't a much more entertaining story out there than Tyson's. He's compelling without trying.

He can reinvent himself all he wants, but he will always be an animal. There was a time when he wanted to push Jesse Ferguson's "nose bone back into his brain."

I guess we'll have one more thing to look forward to in 2000 when Iron Mike comes sprinting out of that halfway house, ready to kill someone in your living room for the low price of $45.95.

Finding mechanics takes perseverance, research

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finding a quality auto mechanic with reasonable rates can be a simple task if the proper steps are taken.

Joyce Woodard, president of the Better Business Bureau of Northeast Kansas, said preparation is a key factor in finding the ideal mechanic. She said relationships should be established with technicians before an emergency arises.

"Think about who you will go to ahead of time, so you can be prepared when you do have to go," she said.

Woodard said students also need to take their time and consider many factors before spending money on the service. Considering shop certification, gathering bids from different shops, asking for personal recommendations from friends and obtaining reliability reports from the BBB are some precautions people should take when choosing a mechanic.

"The important thing is that we don't make a decision too quickly," she said. "We are better off without our vehicle for a few days to make sure we get the most reliable service."

A general quality to look for in all mechanics is that they are certified by Automotive Service Excellence. Technicians must have at least two years of experience and proper schooling before they can obtain the certification. In order for the technicians to keep their status, they are required to update certification every five years.

Oppy's Amoco Service and Briggs Auto Group Inc. are two Manhattan service shops that use ASE certified mechanics. Galen Stacey, Oppy's shop manager, said even though the certification is not required, he thinks it is important in the quality of service the station can provide.

Chris Miner, Briggs associate service manager, said Briggs does additional training through General Motors.

"Everyone here is ASE certified, but GM has other training courses that we take from their school of auto technicians," he said.

After finding properly certified stations, customers still need to check the terms of their vehicle warranties and warranties on the work being done through at least two or three different shop estimates. Estimates are usually free, but sometimes there is a charge attached to looking for the problem.

Stacey said many used cars have after-market warranties that do not cover a lot of things, so customers need to understand what will be covered.

Miner said sometimes stations just do not have the diagnostic equipment available to provide the services and repairs needed for all vehicles. He said Briggs will fix small problems on any vehicle, but due to the complexity of many cars, they are unable to repair all brands of vehicles.

"If it is as deep as computers, we recommend they take it directly to the dealer in town," he said.

Once a choice has been made, Woodard said it is wise to follow the work with a trail of writing. She said she suggests getting a copy of all work done and the cost of parts and labor for each project.

Woodard said students might be vulnerable to finding the lowest price and going with that, but she does not recommend that method.

Aggieville merchants disagree on parking solution

Fire in the Ville: A Year Later

EDITOR'S NOTE: Nearly one year after fire ripped through Aggieville, the Collegian begins a series examining the historic district.

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rumors have been circulating about the possibility of using the empty lot left by last year's Aggieville fire for parking.

The rumors were perpetuated Monday when the lot was bought by Rusty Wilson, owner of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, who said he might consider turning it into a parking lot but that nothing was definite.

"That's just a thought," Wilson said. "That's as far as it's gone. I haven't really got any solid ideas on what I want to do." Wilson said he thinks parking is a problem in Aggieville.

"I don't know if that little lot is the solution," he said. "Anything would help, though."

Aggieville Business Association Director Cheryl Sieben said a parking garage has come up in conversation but that it's not something she foresees for Aggieville's future.

Sieben, who said she doesn't feel there is a big parking problem, said the ABA needs to do a better job of publicizing the parking that is available.

"It's a perception thing," she said. "We do have pretty sufficient parking."

Sieben said the problem isn't with the parking available. It's the fact that everyone is always in a hurry. "People want to dash right in and dash out," she said.

But immediate parking in front of stores is rarely available, Sieben said.

However, she said she did want to stress there are four public lots in Aggieville, and parking spots usually turn over pretty fast.

Also, a lot of business comes to Aggieville by foot, Sieben said. Students walking home from class bring business to Aggieville, so parking isn't a problem for them.

Wilson said he would be in favor of a parking garage. More parking would attract more businesses and more customers, he said.

Sieben said a parking garage might attract more business to Aggieville, but there are a lot of other things to consider when thinking of a parking garage.

"The problem is how would you pay for it and where would you put it," she said. "It's pretty cost-prohibitive from what little research we've done on it."

Sieben said she also would be concerned about how it would look in Aggieville. Would a parking garage fit in with the atmosphere of Aggieville?

Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky BrewGrille and Mighty Fine Doughnuts, said he had an idea for where to put a parking garage.

"Probably right behind Ballard's," he said. "Where the bagel place and Chuck's Car Wash are."

Leetch said a parking garage probably will be one of the most important issues Aggieville will face in the next 10 to 15 years.

"For the future of Aggieville, which is really going to be based on the day business, the one hurdle we're always coming up against is not enough parking in the day," he said. "During the day it's critical."

Lack of parking is the number one reason Aggieville doesn't attract chain stores, Leetch said.

"If we want to get the Gap and Old Navy and Abercrombie and Fitch-type things, we have to get the parking," he said.

Dan Walter, Varney's Book Store textbook manager, said parking causes a problem sometimes, but a parking garage is not the answer.

"On certain days and at certain times of day, parking is definitely tight," he said.

"But I would favor utilizing more open lots as they become available, as opposed to a parking garage," Walter said.

Walter said a parking garage presents a challenge in appearance, maintenance and safety that could be avoided by street-level parking. A parking garage isn't the answer for attracting new businesses, he said.

"I've always thought the best thing was to work to maintain strong businesses," he said.

Maintaining strong businesses promotes a positive image of Aggieville, and that will attract new businesses, Walter said.

Despite how others feel about a parking garage, Leetch is adamant that Aggieville needs one.

"Aggieville is one of the few vibrant shopping and dining areas left," he said.

Senate begins deliberations

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate shut its doors Tuesday to debate its verdict on the impeachment of Bill Clinton, with the outcome so evident that one Republican said bipartisan acquittal was possible by week's end for the second president in history to be put on trial for his job.

After a month and a day spent listening in silence to opposing legal arguments, senators spent four hours in private deliberations in a Senate chamber cleared of House prosecutors, presidential lawyers and gallery spectators.

The first senator to speak in the closed session, Slade Gorton, R-Wash., told colleagues he would vote to remove Clinton because "it is clear that he obstructed justice." Gorton released his remarks following the session. He said he would vote to acquit Clinton on a second charge of perjury. Both charges grew out of the president's affair with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky and efforts to keep it from becoming public.

"I cannot will to my children and grandchildren the proposition that a president stands above the law and can systematically obstruct justice simply because both his polls and the Dow Jones index are high," Gorton said in the statement repeating his closed-door remarks.

In all, 18 senators spoke, Republicans alternating with Democrats, before lawmakers adjourned until today.

"People are very respectful of one another. It's a very dignified climate," said Sen. Paul Wellstone, a Minnesota Democrat who had been among the leaders of a failed effort to open the proceedings to the public. Republican Larry Craig of Idaho said there was relatively little give-and-take although occasionally one senator would interrupt another to ask: "Why do you believe that?" or "Where did you find that?" in the trial record?

There was no indication any Democrat had

Study finds Americans lack interest in sex

STORY BY MARTHA IRVINE ■ THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — More than 40 percent of women and 30 percent of men regularly have no interest in sex, can't have an orgasm or suffer from some other sexual dysfunction, according to what researchers say is the most comprehensive U.S. sex survey since the 1948 Kinsey Report.

The study's lead author, University of Chicago sociologist Edward Laumann, called the findings stunning.

"I think it gives us a base for explaining why we had this enormous response to Viagra," he said.

The researchers said problems with sex often are coupled with everything from emotional and health problems to lack of time, job pressures and money trouble. They said they aren't sure which comes first — stress or problems with sex.

The study is published in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

The researchers based their findings on the 1992 National Health and Social Life Survey, a compilation of interviews with 1,749 women and 1,410 men.

The participants, ages 18 to 59, were asked if they had experienced sexual dysfunction over several months in the previous year. Sexual dysfunction was defined as a regular lack of interest in or pain during sex or persistent problems achieving lubrication, an erection or orgasm.

Lack of interest in sex was the most common problem for women, with about a third saying they regularly didn't want sex. Twenty-six percent said they regularly didn't have orgasms, and 23 percent said sex wasn't pleasurable.

About a third of men said they had persistent problems with climaxing too early, while 14 percent said they had no interest in sex, and 8 percent said they consistently derived no pleasure from sex.

Overall, 43 percent of women and 31 percent of men said they had one or more persistent problems with sex.

The researchers said they had expected the overall numbers to be closer to maybe 20 percent for each sex.

Laumann said the findings could offer hope to millions, many of whom think they're the only ones having trouble in bed.

"Often they don't even admit it to their partners. It's the old 'I've got a

But in residence halls, the demand was too great for free condom program

STORY BY DANICA COTO ■ KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Free condoms will be available in K-State residence halls for the last time on Friday.

A lack of funds forced Eunice Dorst, executive director of the Regional AIDS Project in Manhattan, to cancel the program that provided free condoms to the residence halls.

"It's a shame in a way, because actually it was very popular," Dorst said.

Free condoms were available last fall, but the 75 condoms distributed each week to each hall was increased to 100 by December because of demand. A total of $288 was spent during these two months, and $122 will be spent this week.

"I'm sure people are not aware that they are not being distributed anymore," said Nicki Tidball, senior in social work and a resident assistant at Moore Hall.

No other alternative has been found, but the topic might arise during a Hall Governing Board meeting.

"We'd still like to have them," said

Amber Dowlin, senior in elementary education and Ford HGB vice president.

Students can buy condoms at Lafene Health Center, which sells four condoms for 60 cents, or 10 condoms for $1.50. Free condoms are offered at the Women's Clinic.

Despite the cancellation of the program, Goodnow resident Melody Spearman, freshman in interior design and pre-law, said the change might not effect a lot of students.

"It won't be any different," she said. "Most people couldn't get them anyway since they were gone so fast."

Brendan Hogan, junior in marketing and Haymaker resident, said the halls should find a way to reinstate the program.

"I think it would be beneficial if they did," he said. "If it saves one person from getting a disease, I'm for it."

'Tubas of K-State' raises band funds

By JINA HIPPE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Playing a tuba in the K-State Marching Band isn't all about making music.

This year, the tuba section made a calendar. Members of the marching band's tuba section produced the 1999 Tubas of K-State calendar. This is the second year the section has made a calendar.

The process starts with taking photographs of all 21 section members.

"We did three or four different photo shoots," Lucas Peterson, senior in mechanical engineering, said. "We then sorted through the pictures and picked the best ones."

The members had a hard time deciding which photographs to use because they liked a lot of them, Peterson said.

The calendar includes photographs of tuba players on the K-State campus and in Aggieville. The section members are holding their instruments in all the pictures.

"The thing that shocked me was people seemed to Members of the K-State tuba section were photographed at a variety of locations, including a barber shop, for their calendar.

KSU Police set new rules for skateboards on campus

Citing property damage concerns, the K-State Police have established new rules regarding the use of skateboards on campus.

The policy states that skateboarding is permitted only in university bike lanes. The use of skateboards is restricted on rails, steps, landscape walls, benches and handrails. Stunts of any kind also are prohibited.

"Over the past year, skateboarding has become increasingly more popular," Ronnie Grice, K-State police director, said. "At the same time, those people have done damage to university property."

Before these rules were enacted, campus police had no policy in place, which made skateboarding difficult to regulate.

"Safety and disrespect to property has never been a big problem with K-State students, but it has with local kids," Grice said.

The only time skateboards are really considered dangerous is when stunts are performed, he said. During the stunt, the skateboard can cause damage to any object it hits.

Manhattan's regulations regarding skateboards have been in effect since 1985.

The city's rules state that skateboards are restricted on any sidewalk in a zoned area or any public parking lot owned and operated by a governmental unit.

"The problem is there's no place to go," said Terry DeWeese, Manhattan Parks and Recreation director. "In all fairness, there's not a legal place to tell the people to go."

A committee of youth, parents, local residents and businesses have taken a proposal to the City Commission to build a skate park in Manhattan.

The facility would provide skaters with ramps, rails, jumps and would give them a place to participate in their hobby.

Violators of the skateboarding rules on campus will face consequences resulting in skateboard impoundment. Repeat offenders' skateboards might be confiscated, trespass warnings might be issued and arrests are possible.

Pittsburg State University president to retire in July

PITTSBURG, Kan. — Pittsburg State University President John Darling announced Tuesday that he will retire when his contract ends July 1, saying that he wants to return to teaching.

Darling, 61, said he chose to make the announcement now to give the Kansas Board of Regents time to plan for the transition.

"It is only fair to let them know now what I plan to do," he said. "There are opportunities out there that I want to be able to explore. I cannot do that as the sitting president of a university."

Regents Chairman Bill Docking said he respected Darling's request to return to teaching and pursue other professional interests.

"Pittsburg State University has a long list of accomplishments under President Darling's tenure," Docking said. "He has much to be proud of and we thank him for all that he has done for the university and the Kansas regents system."

Darling took office as university president Jan. 1, 1996, succeeding Donald Wilson, who resigned in 1995.

Darling has 20 years of administrative service in higher education. He said he never moved far from his beginnings in the classroom, having taught international business and marketing at Pittsburg State and in Finland during his time at the university.

Darling holds a tenured position in the Kelce College of Business as a professor of marketing and international business.

The regents will consider a plan for dealing with the vacancy at their regular monthly meeting Feb. 17-18.

Cohen visits South Africa; hopes to build military ties

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — The Clinton administration wants to build closer military ties to South Africa but sees little chance for rapid progress, Defense Secretary William Cohen said Tuesday, as he became the first U.S. defense chief to visit South Africa.

"It's too early to forecast how this relationship will evolve," Cohen told reporters flying with him from Tunisia, where he met Monday night with President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali. "It's going to take some time," and a starting point is to demonstrate U.S. interest, Cohen said.

Only one year ago the U.S. government ended its ban on arms trade with the South African government after the Justice Department settled legal claims of violations of U.S. export laws. U.S. arms exporters missed out on bidding in South Africa's military modernization. In three days in South Africa, Cohen will meet with government officials and military officers to discuss U.S. initiatives for peacekeeper training and an African Center for Security Studies, which the Clinton administration hopes will professionalize the region's armies.

Today Cohen was to meet with his counterpart, Defense Minister Joe Modise, and other defense officials, at the Castle of Good Hope, a pentagonal fortification that is the oldest building in South Africa and is headquarters of the Western Province Command of the South African Army.

Modise told reporters in Cape Town that he intended to raise with Cohen the matters of civil war in Angola and Congo.

Cohen said he would sign a memorandum of understanding with the South Africans on a blueprint for environmental cooperation on such issues as maintaining live-fire military ranges. He also will meet with senior military officers, members of Parliament, community leaders and pay a visit to Deputy President Thabo Mbeki, the heir apparent to President Nelson Mandela.

Violence ends in Cambodia, guerilla fighters enter army

ANLONG VENG, Cambodia — The last holdouts of the Khmer Rouge guerrilla army were inducted into the Cambodian military Tuesday, closing almost three decades of bloodshed in Cambodia.

Some 1,700 guerrillas put down their rifles, shed their green Chinese-style outfits and put on crisp new government uniforms, in a reconciliation ceremony repeated often in recent years during the rebel group's decline and fall.

Anlong Veng, 200 miles northwest of the Cambodian capital of Phnom Penh, had been the last stronghold of the guerrilla group until it was captured in April last year.

"We are entering a new era where all Cambodians are reunited," said Co-Defense Minister Tea Banh, who presided along with Khem Nguon, the last top commander of the guerrilla group. "Peace now prevails all over Cambodia, creating favorable conditions for our nation's development."

In a country where violence has dragged on despite many such "new eras," the bloody legacy of the Khmer Rouge casts a pall over prospects for future peace.

Only one senior Khmer Rouge member remains at large — one-legged army chief Ta Mok. Known as "The Butcher" for his brutality, Ta Mok and about 100 diehard loyalists are still being sought by the government, Tea Banh said.

New form of radiation available for animals

■ K-State veterinarians use radioactive beads to treat cancerous tumors in dogs.

By JENNI LATZKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Brachytherapy, the placement of radioactive sources directly inside or around a tumor, is not a new concept to the world of medicine. But it is revolutionary in the world of veterinary medicine.

The K-State College of Veterinary Medicine is one of few universities in the country to offer this option for pet owners.

"Brachytherapy is not that new," Dr. Laura Garrett, assistant professor of oncology, said. "The concept has been around in human medicine for a long time."

Dr. Garrett works with Dr. Ruthanne Chun and Dr. James Hoskinson in the Department of Clinical Sciences. K-State offers brachytherapy because the veterinary college doesn't have an external beam therapy machine, and this option allows for radiation treatments of animals.

As much of the tumor as possible is surgically removed from the animal. Then a sterile plastic tube is inserted around the remaining tissue. After the wound has healed, radioactive beads are fed into the tube on a long wire. The beads emit a set amount of radiation that will effectively treat the tumor.

Conventional treatment of tumors in pets requires the animal be sedated and subjected to external beam radiation therapy. The treatment, though effective for certain types of tumors, affects the animal's health and is costly, and recovery from the radiation treatments is longer. With brachytherapy, however, the animal doesn't have to recover from repeated bouts with anesthesia, and the procedure is less expensive.

"The price varies, but on the average, external radiation treatments cost anywhere from $2,000 to $5,000," Hoskinson said. "With implants, depending on the surgery needed, it can run between $400 and $1,500."

Unlike radiation therapy for humans, animals rarely experience the nausea and discomfort that usually accompanies radiation.

"Strangely enough, animals don't get sick like people do from the radiation," Garrett said. "We have seen no systemic reactions, except for a mild burn from the site of the beads. Usually, there is nothing at all."

Garrett said this is because the beads emit the radiation intensely in and around the tumor, and the emissions from them decrease in intensity as they travel toward the outer skin.

The staff has only worked with dogs, but there is a potential for the treatment to be used on other pets, such as cats and ferrets, in the future.

Garrett said superficial and implantable skin tumors, such as mast-cell tumors, are the most likely candidates for this therapy. The placement and type of tumor also is a factor. The doctors are limited by where on the animal's body the treatment can be performed.

Pets with a history of cancer who have had previous surgeries to remove tumors are eligible candidates for brachytherapy. Garrett said it is better to administer radiation treatment quickly after the surgery to destroy the cancer.

"If we treat it right away and get it done, then there is a higher success rate and lower potential complications," she said.

Garrett said it is good for pet owners to talk to their veterinarians and ask about the procedure if their pet is diagnosed. Hoskinson said 40 percent of the dogs the school treats for nasal tumors are cured using radiation therapy.

Because the implanted beads emit a constant stream of radiation, only Hoskinson, a licensed radiologist, is allowed to handle the recovering animals. The dogs, once implanted, are held in a well-shielded room and walked twice a day on a long leash.

The animals are limited from all other human or animal contact until the beads are removed five to seven days after the procedure.

Another reason for their isolation is so the radioactive beads are not jostled around and are allowed to do their job. Since the treated animals are confined, Garrett said they need to be otherwise healthy when they come in for treatment and not taking medications for other illnesses.

Hoskinson said the only veterinary students who are taught the surgical techniques for brachytherapy are those specializing in the radiology field.

House proposal would combine Graves' plans

■ Taxation Committee idea would cut statewide school property tax mill levy.

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House is moving toward crafting a tax-relief plan for Kansans that could take parts of Gov. Bill Graves' proposals plus some ideas from lawmakers, including reducing the state sales tax on food.

On Tuesday, the Taxation Committee considered its proposals for reducing corporate and personal income taxes and cutting the statewide school property tax mill levy, completing a series of hearings that have focused on tax relief.

Chairman David Adkins said the committee will put together a proposal in the range of $600 million spread over five years.

Graves has a $563 million package that includes phasing out property taxes on vehicles by 2004.

Graves also wants to eliminate the oil severance tax, increase income tax credits on business machinery and equipment, give tax breaks to people who adopt and sales tax credits for improving grain elevators and short line railroads.

Also in the mix is a significant reduction or elimination of the 4.9-percent sales tax on groceries. It has passed the House and has some Senate support, even though the governor doesn't embrace it.

The committee could come up with a plan that picks from the several offerings in varying degrees, or it could concentrate on one or two areas of sizable tax relief.

"I don't know what the mix will be. It may be picking and choosing from among those options," Adkins, R-Leawood, said.

"You could end up with a blend within the framework of $600 million," he said.

Also factored into the mix will be the extent lawmakers will buy into Graves' ambitious transportation-improvement plan.

"Some of the members are having problems deciding between transportation and tax cuts," Adkins said.

Adkins didn't discard the possibility of the committee fashioning a tax-relief plan that assumes no transportation proposal and uses that money to boost tax cuts.

Adkins said many lawmakers don't like the idea of going further into debt to finance highway projects. Graves would finance much of his transportation plan through the sale of $1.8 billion worth of bonds.

Speaker Robin Jennison said he expects a proposal that includes two or three tax-relief ideas to get something with some broad-based appeal, such as removing the sales tax from groceries.

"Any tax package that has more than one tax break in it probably will have a food tax component," said Jennison, R-Healy.

Adkins' committee considered its bill to reduce the statewide mill levy rate from 20 to 6.1 by fiscal year 2004, costing the state $563.2 million. Last year, lawmakers reduced the mill levy by seven to its current level.

Mark Tallman of the Kansas Association of School Boards spoke against the bill, saying reducing the statewide mill levy could hurt school funding, which he said hasn't been suitable for the past five years.

Another committee bill would cut individual and corporate tax rates, costing the state $561.4 million by 2004.

Tough DUI penalties must apply to minors

The Attorney General's office's recommendation for tougher laws dealing with driving under the influence would be a welcome addition to the law books.

Or, more accurately, it will be a welcome subtraction from the roads.

The proposal would hopefully take more drunk drivers off the road and create stiffer penalties for minors driving under the influence.

Currently, minors who get DUIs only have a blemish on their drivers' licenses. The proposal would create fines or even jail time for such an offense.

Minors deserve equal punishment for DUIs since the automobiles they are driving are just as deadly as they would be if an adult were driving. In fact, since minors generally have less tolerance and less experience driving, it could be said a minor who is driving drunk is more dangerous than an adult who is driving drunk.

The proposal would not change the blood-alcohol measure by which drivers are measured. Minors are considered under the influence if their blood-alcohol measure is .02, whereas adults are measured against a level of .08 or above. Challengers of the proposal argue that it is unfair to prosecute minors against a lower level of proof than adults.

But minors shouldn't be drinking in the first place. There should be a lower measure for minors because drinking is wrong for them, but drinking and driving is infinitely worse. Also, raising the measure would only legitimize their attempts to drink up to the .08 level.

Safety on the streets is not something that should ever be taken lightly. Attorney General Carla Stovall and her staff should be applauded for taking steps to encourage sober driving.

Being a minority and coming to a big university, I just don't feel that the paper is representing who we are, what we are, all as students. I don't see why this has gotten to be a big controversy with DB92. This is supposed to be college. That's not what it's all about.

I don't know what the big deal is over KSDB 92. We're only asking for four hours out of like eight hours that they play on the radio. If you want to listen to urban music, we have to go to Kansas City or Wichita. It's not that bad. If everyone has such a big problem with it, stop listening to DB92.

Mike Vietti is a genius. You ought to run more of his articles.

Definite thumbs up to the Collegian and the Campus Fourum. Whoever knew that K-State students could be so opinionated? And definite thumbs up to DB92 for whatever music they want to play. People want to listen to something different? Flip the dial and listen to Marilyn Manson or Celine Dion five times an hour.

Does anybody out there think that this thing going on with DB92 is indicative of the entire Manhattan music scene? We used to get people like the Dave Matthews Band up here and now you have to drive to Lawrence or Kansas City or St. Louis to see anybody decent.

The bottom line — if you drink, or get in a car with somebody who's been drinking and die, or you drink to excess and die, you're getting what you deserve.

There are plenty of radio stations that play alternative, country and rock. There are not any stations that play urban music that the three percent of the population listen to, and let's not forget, some of the 90 percent does also. So to sum it up — suck it up, dry it up, get over it.

The wrestling show on DB92 rocks.

If you have an ignorant comment, keep it to yourself, because you make this university and yourself look stupid.

I'm very disappointed to see that 95 percent of the responses to the Campus Forum seem to be biased and uncultured and ignorant.

I'm calling on behalf of the DB92 situation. It's great to see that a lot of people are finally realizing how bad people felt in a helpless situation.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

Deadlines. Like noses, we all have them. As you are reading this you, or someone you know, is out there somewhere, dodging a deadline.

Heck, I'm riding the cutting edge of one even as I write this. Exciting, no? It's the time of the semester when I start looking ahead and see due dates as far as the eye can see.

The thing is I have a really bad habit, and I've had it since grade school, of being able to completely block out anything that doesn't happen within the next 24 hours. Sometimes this is good. Usually it's bad.

I rarely ever miss deadlines (by much). I just have a tendency to let them breathe down my neck for a little longer than I should.

Some people claim to work better under pressure. However, I know from cold experience this is not true for all situations. Studying for finals two hours before the test is not wise, nor is writing the term paper the morning it is due.

Why do I do this, I ask you? There's been a few theories formed by various authority figures in my life.

It could be:

A) I am completely disorganized and irresponsible with no thought for anyone but myself.

B) I am lazy.

C) I have an irrational desire to avoid the inevitable and choose to live only in the present.

D) Sometimes laying on my back and looking for animals in the clouds is way more important than writing a column.

Personally I think A is partly true, B is true only before noon, C is just way off base (I hope), and D sounds about right most of the time.

What is it about the human animal that must procrastinate? I'm not saying I'm going to stop, I just want to know why we do this.

Could it be the old adage about not dying if things are left undone? Perhaps it's an irrational fear of not having a project or chore constantly looming.

I've met a few these people who always seem to be caught up. They have everything planned and scheduled to within an inch of it's life.

I think they are simply a higher form of human being, one that I'm not sure I like. These people are no fun at parties, and they make the rest of us look bad.

The thing I like best about my free-wheeling, deadline-flouting, drive-with-the-gas-on-empty lifestyle is that it is fun. Every day can be seen as an adventure.

Some of the best times I've ever had have been when I threw caution, and my planner, to the wind and stepped out of my daily life.

There is no thrill like the thrill that comes when you are halfway to San Antonio and the only thing between you and the return trip home is fifteen bucks in ones and loose change. That's some living right there.

I am not as outrageous as some people I know. The Blues Brothers are the epitome of those who do not plan ahead.

But I have to say planning is good only to

Planning takes away the FUN

Procrastinating brings deadline pressure, makes life exciting a point. Having fun crammed down your throat at someone else's schedule sucks. Not only does it kill the entertainment, great resentment builds for the person doing the planning.

My mother is good at that. Usually her planning made my life easier and home was a safe, calm oasis in the daily storm. Sometimes it was overkill. Heck, I love my mom but every kid should get to schedule their own sandbox time.

So here's what I propose: If you fly by the seat of your scheduling pants, straighten up. You will please some and amaze others.

If you are one of the few, the proud, the organized—back off already. No one wants to say this to your face but you are making the rest of us feel inadequate.

Eat when you are hungry, not when it's dinner time. Let the gas dip below a quarter of a tank once in awhile. Feel the wind in your hair and wear white shoes before Memorial Day.

Try it, I bet you like it.

Finding joy in the ordinary might be key to happiness

Most of us want to find success before we turn 65. The years between now and retirement need to be filled with something of significance. But what and when and how?

Dreaming big is a start. So is enjoying the small.

There are countless opportunities to enjoy ordinary things, but because we are trying so hard to reach our big goals, we miss the little stuff in the process. Not only can we miss the small things, but we'll also overlook the big opportunities if we forget they often have tiny windows.

Colonel Harland Sanders didn't begin his successful career until after he received his first Social Security check. The word "assortment" best described his employment. He dropped out of school and was a farmhand for a while. Blacksmithing didn't work. Neither did fighting fires for the Southern Railroad.

He sold tires and insurance. He even tried his hand at operating a filling station and a ferryboat. They didn't work out.

Most of us would have looked at this man and considered his life unsuccessful. And it would have been simple for Colonel Sanders to do the same. But he didn't. Too bad for the chickens.

But that was him. We all know about his success story. What about us?

Let's say you never make the world's most successful list, which might be best anyway — why defer enjoying life now? Some might argue this really does not need to be said, considering we live in an instant gratification society.

I would agree to the extent that we must be people of lasting sustenance.

We need foundation, and we need to have a vision larger than this lifetime. But this does not detract from the need to find cheer in what we do today.

Having the ability to be content in any situation brings the delight of success before it is ever achieved.

If you are a goal-driven person, you probably find it arduous to be content before reaching your goal. The mark always seems just out of reach. It is easy to lose yourself trying to attain it. But it does not have to be a constant strain.

I'm not saying you need to stop reaching. I'm saying do not miss out on the people and opportunities around you right now. Enjoy the days you spend trying to reach your goal as much as you do obtaining it. Find the wonder-ment in the midst of the typical. You might discover that happiness in the pursuit of your goal can be as rewarding as actually achieving it.

For many of us, we view our personal success as something that has to be achieved a certain way. Like driving down the interstate on the right-hand side of the road. However, there are alternatives.

Flying, bicycling, jogging, you name it. Walking might even be best. It gives us opportunity to observe details in ways others will never understand.

There is a chance we will never reach our specific goals. In the struggle to achieve them, if we are patient, we might discover we really don't want to reach them. If Colonel Sanders had fought fires all his life, he wouldn't have started a famous line of restaurants. But then again, he could have become another Red Adair.

Nothing, no matter how ordinary and simple, should be sloughed off as unworthy of our best effort. While we may not love performing common work, we must remember that it could directly lead to something momentous. The lesson to be learned is that nobodies can do great things.

Delighting in menial tasks and doing them well can be a big part of success. Fray Junipero Serra was a professor of philosophy when something compelled him to go to the mission field. At the age of 55, he did just that. Among the missions he founded were San Diego, San Carlos and San Francisco. He left his mark.

Serra could have remained a philosophy professor. But he had the courage to recognize he was trying to grasp the wrong thing. He may not have completely understood how going to the mission field equated success, but he went.

I am sure there were times when he wondered if he was doing anything of significance. He probably did not gain much money in his line of work, but we now know he did indeed achieve success.

So can we. Maybe not this year. Maybe not through our plans. Maybe not what we expect. This is why it is necessary to be content with where you are, and at the same time, recognize your plans may be altered dramatically.

Pastor's advice on marital sex interpreted as sexist to women

Editor,

Word of Faith Family Church Pastor Mike Aldrich writes in the Feb. 8 issue of the Collegian: "God loves you so much, and if you serve Him, He will bless your life. He will lead you to the marriage partner who is right for you, and once you are married, you can have all the sex you want for the rest of your life."

ALL THE SEX I WANT, FOR THE REST OF MY LIFE? I can't wait to show this to my wife!

On a more serious note, this is, of course, typical of fundamentalist interpretations of the Bible in which women are essentially relegated to the status of second-class citizens. I am surprised Pastor Aldrich didn't add, "Any time you want it." Maybe that was just assumed.

DB92 situation out of hand, racial tension surfaces

Editor,

I am shocked, disgusted and saddened by comments made by various students on this campus regarding the recent controversy involving the DB92 format change and Black Student Union.

Monday's Collegian practically dedicated an entire page to this, adding a few more licks to a horse that has been dead for quite some time now. Regarding my own reactions,

I am shocked and disgusted because the thinly veiled racist and rude remarks made by various callers to the Collegian's Campus Fourum clearly aimed toward members of BSU, as well as other African-American students on this campus, only confirm the negative beliefs many of us have concerning K-State's true feelings about minority students being here.

Likewise, I am saddened because this is the same campus that claims to embrace diversity (we just celebrated the legacy of Martin Luther King Jr.) and encourages students to speak up whenever we feel we are being wronged. Whether the issue is abortion or animal rights, students can be seen in small groups in the free-speech zone voicing their opinions. These were a couple of things I admired about K-State, but it all seems to have been a facade. It appears as if the radio station format change was just the food needed to get the demon of racism to snatch off its mask and show its ugly face once more at K-State.

I am asking those people here on this campus who are so full of hate they feel the need to use the Campus Fourum as a stone to toss at African-American students to look inside themselves and ask, "Why am I really angry?" I understand that the Fourum is open for students to vent their opinions on any subject, but the DB92 situation has gotten out of hand. It is casting a hideous shadow over a university where racial tensions are already lurking behind an extremely thin wall. There are so many more important issues on campus that we all can focus on. It's been more than a month. Let's bury the DB92 horse next to the Dick Gregory station and move on.

Win over Cyclones would boost season

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 1 team in women's Big 12 Conference basketball, No. 15 Iowa State, will be in Manhattan tonight to take on the fifth-place K-State women's basketball team.

Iowa State has a 16-4 record overall and is tied with Texas Tech for first place in the Big 12. K-State is 12-8 overall and tied for eighth with Nebraska. K-State returns to the court after a road victory over Colorado; Iowa State returns after a 68-67 road loss to Nebraska. All four of Iowa State's losses have been on the road and the loss in Lincoln marks the Cyclone's first loss to a non-ranked team this season. The Cats are looking for big wins late in the season to push them into the top four in the Big 12.

"A win against Iowa State would be the most significant win of the season, the highest ranked team we would have defeated," Coach Deb Patterson said. "It would position us to legitimately compete for a top-four spot in the league, and it would give us a great deal of momentum and confidence as we continue through the month of February."

Patterson said Iowa State has an original attack because of its dependence on three-point shooting. She said K-State's answer to this should be quickness in the transition and good one-on-one play for each individual player.

"You've got to find them early, you've got to be constantly aware of where their shooters are on the floor, expect them to be extended, and you need to be prepared to extend well one-on-one because if you rely on a lot of help you just set yourself up for a penetration-kick three-point shot, so you've got to pick them up early and contain penetration."

While K-State doesn't have the 50-percent three-point shooter Iowa State has in junior guard Stacy Frese, the Cats boast this week's Big 12 Freshman of the Week Kristin Rethman, whose three-point shooting earned a victory in Colorado.

"This season I've been trying to get as good of a grasp of the offense and defense as I can and just trying to contribute," Rethman said. "As my teammates have gotten more confidence in me, my confidence has increased as well."

The Iowa State guards have a height advantage over the Cats, but point guard Essence Perry said she didn't think this would affect the game. She said the team learned in Colorado that the key to winning is in playing well together with determination.

"I don't think it'll really be a problem if we go out there and work hard on defense," Perry said. "I think it's just going to take teamwork and everyone going out there with a big heart and playing hard. It's just about the desire to win, who wants it most."

Wrestling made club sport

A group of wrestlers meet requirements as the newest club team.

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wrestling was approved to join the ranks of competitive club teams at K-State in January.

K-State's new wrestling team was started by Adam Hayes, freshman in art.

Hayes found out what K-State required of club teams and proceeded to fulfill the requirements by getting a club sponsor, Erik Graefe, instructor of speech, and raising enough money to pay for the club's registration fee.

"I wanted a team here because we have a great deal of wrestling talent at K-State," Hayes said. "Kansas has some of the best wrestling talent in the nation at the high school level, although many of the wrestlers go out of state to continue their wrestling careers."

"Those that have the talent to wrestle at the collegiate level, but want to stay in state, just quit wrestling. Those athletes could field a pretty good team here," he said.

The team will join the National Collegiate Wrestling Association based in Dallas. The NCWA complies with the rules and regulations of the NCAA.

The mission of the NCWA is to restore wrestling programs to Division I universities who have dropped them after competing on a national level for a number of years.

K-State will join the Southwest Conference of the NCWA. The conference features four other Big 12 Conference universities that don't have varsity wrestling teams at this time.

Texas, Texas Tech, Kansas, and the top-ranked NCWA team Texas A&M all compete in the Southwest Conference.

Hayes said he hopes the recently established wrestling club will jumpstart interest on campus in hope of building a national contending team in the NCWA, which could lead to more support in restoring a varsity-level wrestling program at K-State.

"If we can get enough people out for the team that want to work hard and build to a high national ranking if not a title-contending team down the road in the NCWA, some people would notice that there is talent and interest here at K-State to have a varsity team," Hayes said.

Although the club team has already been created, it is still in need of committed wrestlers to field a complete team.

Hayes said if anyone is interested in wrestling they can contact him via e-mail at adh7510@ksu.edu or can reach him by phone at 395-3660.

GAME NOTES
K-State leads the all-time series with the Cyclones 33-13, including a 17-4 edge in Manhattan, but Iowa State has won the last three meetings, and five of the last six. Rethman's game-winning three-pointer last weekend against Colorado helped the freshman garner Big 12 Rookie of the Week honors. The Cats picked up their fifth road win of the season on Saturday, marking the most road wins since the 1990-91 season. K-State has come back from second-half deficits six times this season to win. The Cats will be back in action Saturday at Oklahoma.

Building Momentum

Cats need to move past victory over Iowa State Cyclones and learn consistency in order to claim victory in College Station over Texas A&M.

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER ■ PHOTO BY STEVE HEBERT

K-State is coming off its first Big 12 Conference road victory of the season at Iowa State, and now has its eyes set on the Texas A&M Aggies, which it takes on Wednesday in College Station, Texas.

The Aggies are ninth in the conference with a 10-10 overall record and a 3-7 mark in conference play, while the Cats (15-8 overall, 4-6 Big 12) are ranked seventh in conference play.

Aggies assistant coach Bobby Kummer attributes his team's struggles to the lack of knowledge of the system, which could lead to the 19.2 turnovers the Aggies are averaging per game. They have the second-highest turnovers-per-game average in the conference.

"Our guys are still learning the system right now," Kummer said Tuesday. "We're in just about all of our games, but we turn the ball over too much. It's going to be pretty hard to win when you turn the ball over 30 times a game. We know we're doing some things right when we are still in the games late, and turnovers are the main concern. The most important thing for us right now is learning how to execute."

Despite the important road win for the Cats, head coach Tom Asbury is quick to point out they can't concentrate on the win because there is still a lot of basketball to be played this season.

"We certainly don't have any time to dwell on it," Asbury said. "We've got to figure out what we did — as if we don't know — then we have to build on it."

"Because of where we stand in the league we can still make a dent, but we obviously have to get cranking, big time."

The Aggies feature two players averaging in double figures with junior guard Clifton Cook averaging 15.5 points per contest, which ranks sixth in the conference, and senior forward Shanne Jones posting 15.3 points per game to rank seventh in the conference.

"Both players have done a good job for us this year," Kummer said. "The team goes by way of Cook. He is the engine of this team. His play dictates the team's play."

As for K-State, three players are enjoying double-figure scoring averages this season. Junior guard Cortez Groves is pacing the Cats for 10.8 points per game, while junior forward Tony Kitt and junior guard Josh Reid average 10.0 points each.

Reid echoed Asbury, saying the Cats have to move on with the victory and look to the rest of the conference foes this season.

"It was nice to pull out a road victory," Reid said. "We still have about three more road games to focus on though."

Consistency continues to be at the heart of the Cats' problems this season. This was evident as the Cats shot 33 percent from the field in the first half and 56 percent in the second half against the Cyclones.

"Sometimes it seems as if they have two different teams this year," Kummer said about K-State. "But against Iowa State, they hit some tough shots in the second half. They have four or five guys who can score at any given time."

With little time remaining before the conference tournament, Kummer said the teams that execute will be the teams that prove themselves in the end.

"Coming down the stretch part of the season, execution is the key," Kummer said. "When it comes this far, everyone knows what everyone is going to be doing. It's just a matter of who can cut out the mistakes and execute their game."

GAME NOTES
K-State leads the all-time series with the Aggies 5-1, but the Aggies won the only ever meeting in College Station, Texas. This is K-State's first-ever visit to Reed Arena which opened at the beginning of this season. Coach Tom Asbury has used six different starting lineups this season. Rhodes needs 40 more points this season to move into the Top 20 list of scores in school history. The Cats rank fourth in the nation in field goal percentage defense (36.5 percent) and fifth in the nation in rebound margin (+9.0). K-State will be back in action Saturday at home against Baylor.

Basketball superfans' crazy antics show support for men's team; other fans could learn a few tricks

A guy wearing a Duke Blue Devils hat sat down next to a group of men wearing leisure suits, afro wigs and large costume jewelry.

"Cameron Crazies, my ass," a group member yelled at the Duke fan.

The Duke fan turned to the group and smiled. He probably smiled because someone in Bramlage Coliseum, an arena that fills up once a season, was mocking the Cameron Crazies, who would pack Cameron Indoor Stadium to see the Blue Devils play Haven High School.

Maybe the Duke fan had no comeback because he realized who he sat next to, the best basketball fans in America. Yes, they're as good of a group of fans as one can find anywhere in the country.

The group, consisting of Brad Kracht, Brandon Durant, Barret Kracht, Chris Schepmann, Brad Daily and Brandon Bell, are K-State's superfans, a group that has been a staple of K-State basketball through thick and thin — but mostly thin — for six years.

The superfans got their roots in 1993 when Daily, Bell and Jeremy Schepmann, Chris Schepmann's cousin, were looking for a way to get on television during the K-State vs. Wichita State basketball game. Their original idea included wearing sweat-shirts saying, "What are you looking at (certain part of male anatomy)-nose?"

"We decided not to go with that, and Daily said 'Let's do ref shirts,' and that's what we did," Bell said.

Nowadays, the superfans' superfanning credentials are impressive. They always start the line outside of Bramlage before the games, and they still reveal the ref shirts moments before tipoff. They stand on the front row behind the K-State bench during every home game. They're unlimited menu of trash talk regularly dished out to K-State opponents sounds like something out of "White Men Can't Jump," except the superfans are more creative.

The most fanatic of the superfans are probably the originals, Bell and Daily.

Bell, a December graduate, postponed taking his new job in Iowa two weeks just so he could superfan at the K-State vs. KU game Feb. 1.

Daily, a 1997 graduate and now a student at KU Medical Center, went to the game even though he had a test at 8 a.m.

the next day.

Minutes before the game, Daily proudly revealed some tricks of the superfanning trade.

"During warmups, if a ball the other team is shooting comes to you, you hold it until they walk up to you to get it," Daily said. "Right when they get to you, you throw it to our team."

One of Daily's favorite stories to tell about superfanning is that of a Coppin State player the superfans heckled all night a few years ago. When the play took a seat after fouling out, he flipped the superfans off and promptly received a technical foul.

"That's our job. It is to try to get the other team frustrated and not thinking about their game plan," Bell said. "It's just fun to get the other team riled up so they're not thinking about what they should be. They're thinking about us."

I hope I never meet up with any of those guys in a bar.

The superfans are the kind of guys you would have seen in Ahearn Field House, where the Wildcats have a 377-87 record in its 38 years of basketball. They're the remnants of those Ahearn fans who were passionate about K-State basketball and obnoxious enough to tell you about it.

Now, in Bramlage's 11th year, K-State is seeing a drop in its average attendance.

Coach Tom Asbury realizes the importance of the superfans, who are some of the only supporters he has left.

Asbury paid part of the fee for the fans to attend the Dick Vitale dinner before the 1997 Fright Night with Dicky V.

The superfans' appearance and behavior doesn't seem to bother Bell because he knows it serves a purpose.

"We're just the idiot superfans who do stupid things to try to help the team out," Bell said.

Bell is right, the superfans do help the Medical use of marijuana in question

By CATHERINE STRONG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The government's ban on using marijuana for medicinal purposes will be tested in the nation's capital as a woman suffering from multiple sclerosis stands trial for lighting a joint in a congressman's office.

Renee Emery Wolfe said smoking marijuana is the only way she gets relief when her muscles go into spasms from the disease she has had for two decades.

For Wolfe, "having a joint is like an asthma inhaler," she said.

Last Sept. 15, Wolfe lit a marijuana cigarette in the office of Rep. Bill McCollum, R-Fla., to bring attention to the issue of medical marijuana.

"This patient has run out of patience," said Wolfe, a 38-year-old mother of three from Ann Arbor, Mich.

"It's an uphill battle that I'm fighting," she said after Superior Court Judge Anita Josey-Herring set an April 26 trial date.

"I feel that if I have to talk to every judge in this country to get things changed, I will," Wolfe said.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said prosecutors are pushing the case because possession of marijuana is against the law in the District of Columbia.

There is a growing national debate about the use of marijuana for medical reasons. Voters in six states — California, Arizona, Alaska, Oregon, Nevada and Washington — have approved measures in the last few years allowing use of marijuana for medical reasons. Congress barred the District of Columbia from counting the District's results from a similar ballot initiative last fall.

The New England Journal of Medicine has editorialized in favor of medical marijuana and the American Medical Association, altering its policy, voted to urge the National Institutes of Health to support more research on the subject.

Topeka newspaper names Wefald top Kansan

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It seemed to be just an ordinary December morning until President Jon Wefald discovered his own picture in The Topeka Capital-Journal. The newspaper's editorial board selected him as the 1998 Kansan of the Year.

"I was delighted and surprised," Wefald said.

"To receive this award is an exceptional thrill and honor for me," he said.

Joan Finney, Nancy Landon

Kasabauer, Baker and Fred

Bramlage had won the award in previous years, but Wefald is the first university president to win the award.

"It is like winning the gold medal," he said.

"I lived most of my life in the upper Midwest, but today I feel like a Kansan, a K-Stater."

The newspaper mentioned the accomplishments K-State has achieved since Wefald became university president in 1986.

"He turned K-State around," said Karen Sipes, features managing editor at The Capital Journal.

Before 1986, K-State's football program was recognized as one of the nation's worst, and the university's enrollment had decreased.

Robert Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, described Wefald as a man with visions who wanted to implement change.

"I had the good fortune to work with university presidents for the past 27 years," Krause said.

Krause highlighted Wefald's interest in people and his caring attitude as president.

"Jon Wefald is the kind of person with whom you sit down and have a conversation with, whether you sit in the Union with steelworkers or in the President's cabinet in Washington, D.C.," said

John D. Goossen, publisher of The Capital Journal.

Since Wefald became president, enrollment increased from 15,000 to more than 20,000 students, and 2.2 million square feet of new buildings have been built.

The university has also received many academic awards since Wefald's arrival.

K-State ranks first in the nation among four-year public colleges and universities in

Truman and Goldwater scholarships.

"To become successful, you have to hire outstanding people and delegate responsibilities,"

Wefald said.

"Hopefully they are smarter than you."

Wefald summarized the ingredients of an efficient and competent president.

"You have to get out of the box, show up and solve problems immediately," he said.

"I have never sat down at my desk."

However, Wefald said he has experienced setbacks in his career.

"The most disappointing events at K-State are not getting faculty salaries up and the loss against

Texas A&M last year," he said.

At the moment, faculty salaries rank near the bottom of all Big 12

Wefald said he wanted to make the issue one of his top priorities.

Projects for the future include raising faculty salaries above the Legislature-recommended 4.7-percent raise, constructing new and developing more focused graduate programs, he said.

Wefald said he rejected three job offers from the University of Minnesota, Ohio State University and Texas A&M with a yearly wage twice as much as the $160,000 he earns at K-State.

"It would be hard to leave,"

Wefald said.

War films fight for Academy awards

By MICHAEL FLEEMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Attesting to Hollywood's fascination with World War II, three movies set against the war — "Saving Private Ryan," "The Thin Red Line" and "Life Is Beautiful" — were nominated Tuesday for best-picture Oscars and will go up against two Elizabethan-era tales, "Shakespeare in Love" and "Elizabeth."

COURTESY PHOTO
Steven Spielberg, best director Oscar nominee for his work on the film "Saving Private Ryan," engages with actors on the set of the movie. The 71st Annual Academy Awards will air March 21 on ABC.

"I think this is a tribute to the veterans," Steven Spielberg said of the 11 nominations for his brutally realistic "Private Ryan." "It's important that before this century is out ample recognition is paid to the veterans who saved the world."

At least eight movies dealing with World War II have won the award for best picture, including Spielberg's "Schindler's List."

"Shakespeare in Love," a rollicking romance about the Bard seeking his muse, emerged with a leading 13 nominations, one shy of the record 14 for "Titanic" last year and "All About Eve" in 1950. "Elizabeth," about the intrigues behind the throne, tied "The Thin Red Line" and "Life Is Beautiful" with seven nominations.

The most wins for a movie is 11, a record shared by 1959's "Ben-Hur" and last year's "Titanic."

The Oscars will be presented March 21 on ABC, with Whoopi Goldberg back for a third time as host.

The nominations offered the usual snubs and inconsistencies.

"The Truman Show" picked up nominations for director Peter Weir and screenwriter Andrew Niccol, but missed out on best picture. The star, Jim Carrey, also wasn't nominated. "Elizabeth" got a best picture nomination, but director Shekhar Kapur was overlooked.

But mostly the nominations spoke to Hollywood's — and America's — interest in World War II, with three of the five best picture nominees set during that period.

Each of the nominated war pictures bore the stamp of the directors:

■ Spielberg, who as one of Hollywood's most powerful filmmakers had the resources to create what many called the most realistic depiction of battle ever filmed — 30 minutes of bloody, noisy, confusing and arbitrary hell on the beaches of Normandy. Its nominations included honors for director Spielberg, star Tom Hanks and Robert Rodat for original screenplay.

■ Terrence Malick, in a triumphant return to Hollywood after a two-decade absence (his previous film was "Days of Heaven" in 1978), created in "The Thin Red Line" a lyrical movie that alternated brutal war scenes with stunning nature shots. Malick's direction and adapted screenplay were nominated.

■ Roberto Benigni, who is a big star in Italy but not very well known in the United States, combined low comedy with tragic circumstances in "Life Is Beautiful" to tell the story of a father trying to shield his son from the horrors of a concentration camp. Benigni scored the rare feat of being nominated for lead actor, director and screenwriter.

"Life Is Beautiful" also became the first film since 1969's "Z" to be nominated for both best picture and best foreign-language film.

"I am really thunderstruck," Benigni said. The Academy's interest in World War II was rivaled only by its fascination with England's Queen Elizabeth, who reigned 400 years ago.

Two actresses who played the monarch were nominated: Judi Dench, for a supporting role in "Shakespeare," and Cate

HANKS

Blanchett, for a leading role in "Elizabeth." "Shakespeare" also brought nominations to director John Madden, star Gwyneth Paltrow, supporting actor Geoffrey Rush and screenwriters Marc Norman and Tom Stoppard.

Common love of reading reunites literary society

By GIGI MCCALL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The rebirth of the K-State Metaforum Literary Society is once again uniting students who share a love of literature.

Metaforum, which meets once a month, was one of eight literary societies that became popular at K-State between 1864 and 1943. These societies focused on the literary and forensic development of their members, providing an opportunity for writing, public speaking and debating.

The organization, which began again in fall 1997, serves as an opportunity for interaction among students who share an interest in literature.

Alison Wheatley, assistant professor of English and adviser for Metaforum, said that with support from Department of English faculty and a group of students, the decision to renew Metaforum was made.

"We wanted an organization where students interested in literature and writing could have fun getting together and enjoying literary activities," Wheatley said. "I was also eager to promote English as a major or minor where students can have a seriously good time."

Sheyene Foster, senior in English and member of Metaforum, said members of the organization formalized a schedule and began to have monthly meetings last semester. Past activities included a reading of excerpts from favorite banned books in honor of Banned Books Week in October, as well as a movie night and an organizational planning meeting for other events.

Foster said Metaforum plans to be host of a game night for its meeting next month. In April, the group will help plan and prepare for performances by the Shenandoah Shakespeare Express, a touring group of actors who tour the United States annually.

Metaforum is open to students of all majors, and Foster said any student with an interest in literature is encouraged to join.

Foster said she thought Metaforum allowed students to participate in stimulating discussion about literature and writing.

"Metaforum provides an opportunity to really get to know other students interested in literature and creative writing in a less formal setting," she said. "It also encourages students to engage in topics in literature and creative writing outside the classroom."

Wheatley said she is not sure why Metaforum had been discontinued in the past, but that it probably was due to a lack of student leadership and interest.

The organization has 40 members, and Wheatley said she hopes many more will join. She said that the organization's members keep the club going strong.

"They seem to enjoy the company and the activities, and they have a desire to keep the club alive," she said.

Textbook listings fall below predicted numbers

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The use of K-State's World Wide Web site where students can buy and sell textbooks has been below expectations. It currently lists only 100 books for sale.

The Wildcat Book Exchange program is designed for students to sell books directly to each other instead of selling them to the bookstore.

But Andy Macklin, student body vice president, said while the program is doing well for being new, it has been less effective than he would have liked.

"The program just needs to ease its way into the K-State culture," he said. "It's difficult to break the habits of how students are already selling their books."

Last spring, when Tracey Mann, student body president, and Macklin were running for office, one of their main campaign platforms was to create a book-swap program for student use.

Bob Fox, senior in information systems, had the same idea and was already working on the Web site when Mann and Macklin were elected, Macklin said.

"When we found out that Bob Fox had already started on a Web page, we decided to cooperate with him instead of starting a competition," Macklin said.

Fox, who created the Web site last May, said he has maintained it this year. However, Fox will graduate in May, and he gave the project to the Student Governing Association so the program could continue.

Fox said the book-swap program has been reasonably successful.

"It's going pretty good right now," Fox said. "We have 100 books posted, but I don't know how many people have actually sold their books."

There is no way to keep track of how many books have been sold through the program because the site just lists the books available for sale, Fox said.

The Web page works by letting students post a book to add it to the list. The book can be unposted to remove it from the list.

"In order to see how many books are actually being sold, I want to add a survey system that would come up automatically when someone unposted a listing," he said. "I would like to ask them if they sold the book that was listed and how effective they thought the program was."

There has been little feedback so far. "I received a few e-mails about it, and one girl said that she was able to sell all of her books through the program," Fox said.

By incorporating the book-swap program into SGA, Macklin said he hopes it will be established for years to come.

With technology more and more prominent, we are setting aside a seat in the cabinet that the president appoints each year for a technology chair," Macklin said.

"Responsibility for the book-swap program will fall to that person."

Macklin said Wesley Blue, SGA executive cabinet member and senior in management information systems, has filled the role of a technology chair this year.

The chair would be responsible for maintaining the book-exchange Web page as well as being a consultant on other technology-related issues, Blue said.

"With computers and technology becoming more and more important, it will be nice to have a guy on the cabinet who has a vague understanding of how it all works," Blue said.

Macklin said he is trying to publicize the program through several mediums to increase awareness.

"Between word of mouth, traditional advertising and some more creative approaches, we hope that we can let more K-State students know about this opportunity," he said.

After listening to Joydrop's new album, "Metasexual," one has to wonder if Alanis Morissette knows she's being imitated.

The rock band's latest offering features variety in the musical styles but mostly depressing, overdone song lyrics and familiar-sounding vocals by Tara Slone.

The saving grace for Slone, who sounds too much like a crooning, whiney Morissette, are bassist Tom McKay and guitarist Thomas Payne, who all but drown out Slone's screeching with superior instrumentals. This is apparent in the first track, "Fizz," which blares a tale of losing one's innocence.

The second track, "Beautiful," is a far cry from the first. The instrumentals are calm and soothing in a song about being jealous of one's beauty. Once again, Slone sings about a clichéd topic, and her throaty vocals are hidden well by the bass, guitar and drums.

The listener, after the first three tracks, might get tired of the same dominant instrumentals, but the addition of a tambourine in the fourth track breaks this monotony. The sound of a techno beat in the sixth track adds a small amount of variety.

A change in theme finally occurs in the eighth track, "Over and Under," the first song in the album that doesn't have a depressing theme, in which the vocalist says goodbye to a lost love and looks to the future with hope. Instead of dwelling on the loss of her love, Slone's optimism is apparent in the lyrics and is a welcome change.

This breath of fresh air doesn't last long, though. Track 11, "No One," is a stereotypical "love lost" song, and Slone is back to her old whining again.

The final track, "Until," is a message from the band, advising its listeners to live life to the fullest, lest they end up like the miserable people portrayed in its other songs: "Until the joy drops again, stay strong, remain / Until the joy drops again, it won't be long."

The strong instrumentals by McKay, Payne and drummer Tony Rabalao are the one thing that might make the listener want more of Joydrop. Slone, while her howling is intended to be the center of most of the songs, is shadowed, thankfully, by the blaring instrumentals.

What it all comes down to is a horrible mirror image of Morissette, complete with a full band. In the case of Joydrop's "Metasexual," though, imitation is not the

STUDENTS LOOKING FOR CAREERS IN AVIATION GET THEIR WINGS
AT THE K-STATE-SALINA CAMPUS

LEARNING TO FLY

Ross Razak, senior in aviation management, found what he was looking for at K-State, but not in Manhattan.

Rather, Razak, who got his private pilot license at 17 and intends to work in the aviation industry, goes to school in Salina. K-State-Salina offers two-and four-year programs for aviation degrees to students wishing to pursue a career as a pilot or in other areas of aviation.

Peter Kennedy, interim department head for aviation, said most major airlines, such as Trans World Airlines or United Airlines, screen applicants for college degrees.

"Most applications are screened through a computer, and if there is no record of a college degree, it stops right there," he said.

Bill Gross, chief pilot at K-State-Salina, said unlike other schools, K-State-Salina is a Federal Aviation Agency-approved school. This means students can earn a commercial pilot certificate with only 190 hours of flight time, instead of the regular 250 hours.

"This allows us to use a very structured format to follow. They monitor the curriculum, records and the students' progress," he said.

The first step in the aviation sequence is obtaining a private pilot license, which requires 40-45 hours of flight time and a minimum age of 17. In the first semester, students also go through ground school where they learn the basics of rules, regulations and systems in aviation.

In the second semester, students begin to get an instrument rating. This allows them to fly in clouds or in overcast weather and requires another 40-45 hours of flight time.

In the third semester or during the summer session, students complete another 50 hours of cross-country flying. If everything is on schedule, by the spring semester of their sophomore year, students should have a commercial pilot certificate, Kennedy said.

"Most students will choose to take five years to complete the program for a variety of reasons. The major reason is because of money, and if there is bad weather, a student can also get backed-up," Kennedy said.

The money factor is one of the reasons why only about 140 students are enrolled in the aviation sequence, Kennedy said. For the flight training, books and tuition, it could cost $30,000 for a four-year degree.

"I have only seen a handful of students drop out of the program because of the money," Frank Martin, senior in aeronautical technology, said. "People find a way to make ends meet through jobs or financial aid if they really enjoy what they are doing."

As students move through the four-year avi-

Cole Younger, junior in airway science, does a preflight inspection of the Cessna 172 he prepares to fly last week at K-State-Salina. There are about 140 students enrolled in the flight program at K-State-Salina.

ation degree, advanced aerodynamics, advanced meteorology and air safety are some of the classes in the curriculum. The multi-engine rating is also acquired as part of the bachelor of science degree.

Another option is for students to become a flight instructor during their senior year to build flight time. This way, they can have a better chance at a job after graduation.

Since Razak already had his private pilot license before he entered college, he became a flight instructor in fall 1997. He teaches students to fly for their private, commercial and multi-engine ratings.

"I tried to finish the ratings quickly so I could get the instructor's rating and start building enough hours to get a job," he said.

Gross said it is important to start as a flight instructor because commuter airlines require 1,200 to 1,500 hours of flying time before they will hire someone. However, this is beginning to change.

Due to a growing shortage of pilots, commuter airlines have started to hire pilots with as few as 800 hours.

Kennedy said the shortage is occurring for a couple of reasons. First, airlines were not hiring for a long time, and since pilots are required to retire at the age of 60, this has caused an inverted pyramid.

"They are losing pilots in the airlines and filling the empty spots with those in the commuter and commercial airline industries," he said.

Major airlines are also expanding, and a timesharing program has been created where companies can buy one-fourth or one-eighth of a jet, which has created other problems in the industry caused by overproduction. The military is also about 700 pilots short.

"There are many options available, and with the shortage of pilots, if you have the flight hours, there are great opportunities out there," Razak said.

Martin said he would like to build enough hours to work his way into the major airlines such as United or American Airlines.

"This has been a dream of mine since I was a little kid," he said.

"It started off as a hobby, but I decided I wanted to do something a little more exciting with my life."

"IT STARTED OFF AS A HOBBY, BUT I DECIDED I WANTED TO DO SOMETHING A LITTLE MORE EXCITING WITH MY LIFE."

— FRANK MARTIN, SENIOR IN AERONAUTICAL TECHNOLOGY AT K-STATE-SALINA

The K-State-Salina aviation facilities include a fleet of airplanes for flight training, a shop and hangar for maintaining the fleet, and an aircraft maintenance training facility.

K-State-Salina students, faculty work together to improve College of Technology and Aviation

Students at K-State-Salina are similar to those in Manhattan. They share some of the same classes and rules, and the Wildcat pride runs just as rampant. However, while the College of Technology and Aviation might share the K-State name, the 878 students enrolled are still in the process of getting things off the ground.

"We're a smaller college, and we have a lot of changes happening right now," said Mariana Lebron, director of student life at K-State-Salina. "Our whole student-life program has changed a lot in the past year. I've never seen a student body work harder saying, 'Hey, we can make this a better place,' because they believe in it."

K-State-Salina offers both associate's and bachelor's degrees in several engineering technology and aviation areas. Matt Melvin, director of college advancement, said K-State-Salina is attractive to prospective students because courses are focused toward hands-on education.

"They want something that's going to get them a better job and more money,"

Melvin said. "That's our niche. We're more hands-on, more into applicable solutions so our graduates can hit the ground running."

New technology and facilities also are a big hit with students, he said.

"First, it's a K-State degree, which is a huge deal," Melvin said. "Second, when they come and you have the ground and facilities like we do, it has a huge impact on people. They can see what kind of technology we have. It's state-of-the-art. In fact, some of our equipment is better than the businesses have."

Because of the limited enrollment and amount of technology, classes are much smaller than those at the main campus.

Erin Elwick, a sophomore in public relations, attended K-State-Manhattan her freshman year. She transferred to the Salina campus to live at home and become financially secure.

"The ratio of students to teachers is so much better," Elwick said. "It provides a better relationship. Their time is not divided between a lot of students, and they get to know you personally."

NATO threats push Kosovo toward peace treaty

By JEFFREY ULBRICH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMBOUILLET, France — The American mediator at the Kosovo peace talks pointed to progress Tuesday despite a deadlock over demands from rival Serbs and ethnic Albanians.

"This is not easy, and frankly it's not a lot of fun ... but we are making progress," said Christopher Hill, who leads the team of three mediators shuttling between Serb and ethnic Albanian delegations.

The talks aim to reach a three-year interim settlement for Serbia's southern province of Kosovo, where more than 2,000 people have died and about 300,000 have been driven from their homes in a year of fighting between Yugoslav forces and ethnic Albanians who want independence.

The warring parties were pushed to the table by the threat of NATO attacks on Serbia, which makes up Yugoslavia along with the smaller Montenegro.

Foreign ministers Hubert Veldrine of France and Robin Cook of Britain arrived Tuesday, three days after the opening of the talks, in an apparent effort to move them along.

They met with mediators Hill, Wolfgang Petritsch of Austria and Boris Mayorsky of Russia.

"You should not think it is always a crisis when we come here," Cook told reporters. "Sometimes we are here to make sure there is progress."

The Albanians and Serb delegations remained deadlocked on the third full day of talks over a Serb demand to keep Yugoslavia's borders intact and Albanian demands for a referendum on independence, a formal cease-fire and NATO guarantees for the eventual interim settlement.

Representatives of the Kosovo Liberation Army said they would accept only independence.

Serbia has rejected freedom for Kosovo, where 90 percent of its 2 million people are of ethnic Albanian descent.

Mediators want the Albanians to give up their demand for independence — at least during a three-year interim period.

Hill said keeping the delegations on track was difficult.

Each side, fearing that it will come up a loser, is trying to jump ahead to more difficult issues before some of the basics are settled.

"They come forward with a lot of extra ideas," he said. "It's always good to encourage ideas, but sometimes the supply of them exceeds the demand. There are times people want to jump ahead ... but what we want to do is work on the political settlement."

The six-nation Contact Group — the United States, Russia, France, Britain, Germany and Italy — drafted the interim settlement. Topics that have not been broached yet include how such a settlement will be implemented or the eventual deployment of NATO troops into Kosovo.

NATO generals are working on plans to dispatch 25,000-30,000 troops to Kosovo, including up to 4,000 Americans, to enforce the peace agreement.

Russia strongly opposes the NATO threat of force. A Western military source, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Tuesday that discussion of a NATO deployment is being put off until the end of the talks to avoid a diplomatic dispute with the Russians.

Yugoslav Foreign Minister Zivadin Jovanovic said in Belgrade that autonomy for Kosovo would be no problem, but when asked whether his government would allow foreign peacekeeping troops to be stationed in Kosovo, he said, "Under no condition."

In Washington, D.C., the Clinton administration said Serbia would be making a "big, big mistake" if it rejects a NATO peacekeeping force in Kosovo.

New task force would study railroad expansion

By LEW FERGUSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Kansas would conduct a feasibility study for expanding rail passenger service in the state, if a resolution endorsed Tuesday by the House Transportation Committee is adopted by both houses of the Legislature.

The resolution calls for creation of a nine-member legislative task force.

It would study the preservation, enhancement or establishment of passenger rail service, including possibly joining with other states in a regional compact.

The resolution grew out of discussions with the Midwest Regional Rail Initiative, which has long-range plans to bring high-speed passenger rail service to Kansas City's historic Union Station.

Rep. Ed McKechnie, D-Pittsburg, who has met with Oklahoma and Texas officials promoting restoration of passenger service in their states, outlined the proposal before the Senate and House transportation committees.

"With the recent announcement of Amtrak moving back into Kansas City's Union Station, we now have the metro hub necessary to make a regional rail system operate," McKechnie said.

He said he also planned to outline the proposition to officials and chamber representatives of 11 cities on Wednesday, including Arkansas City, Emporia, Fort Scott, Garden City, Newton and Topeka.

The Senate panel did not act on the resolution Tuesday, but the House committee endorsed it unanimously.

The task force is to submit an interim report to the 2000 Legislature and a final report and recommendations to the 2001 Legislature.

Of immediate interest, McKechnie said, is a proposal by Oklahoma to begin service from Oklahoma City to Tulsa, Okla., and then either to Kansas City, Mo., or Newton to connect with Santa Fe, N.M., or Union Pacific main lines running east and west.

An eventual goal might be, he said, restoring passenger service along four Kansas corridors — Tulsa, Okla., to Kansas City, Mo., up the state's eastern border; Kansas City, Mo., to Denver along the Interstate 70 corridor; Kansas City, Mo., to Oklahoma City via Newton and Wichita; and Kansas City, Mo., to Colorado through Hutchinson, Dodge City and Garden City, Kan.

Jim Woolf, an Amtrak official from Chicago, said Amtrak will help states add passenger lines, as long as they provide the funding and agree to subsidize those lines if they do not meet original expectations and cover expenses. He said Amtrak only charges for the actual cost of the service.

Woolf said Amtrak now has contracts with Missouri — to operate rail passenger service between Kansas City, Mo., and St. Louis — and with Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan, and expects to get an agreement soon with Oklahoma.

If the ethnic Albanians agree to a settlement, including peacekeepers, and the Serbs refuse, "the Serbs will be subject to airstrikes," State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said.

The Serb and Kosovo Albanian delegations are working on separate floors of the chateau. Officially, they don't meet, but they do bump into one another in the halls and at the buffet table. Eventually, when the issues are narrowed, the Serbs and Kosovo Albanians might be brought together.

"The appropriate time to bring them together is when there is a greater prospect for agreement," Cook said. "After three days, it is not surprising we are not there. There is businesslike progress and we must keep up the momentum."

Commission wants diet industry to give more product information

■ Group says customers should know more about $33 billion diet business.

By KALPANA SRINIVASAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The multi-billion-dollar diet industry should beef up the information it gives people trying to slim down, a government-created coalition said.

The voluntary guidelines cover the costs and risks of weight-loss programs but not what people really want to know: how many pounds they can expect to lose.

The Federal Trade Commission and other members of the group — including consumer and health advocates as well as industry representatives — will release the guidelines today.

Members of the coalition, called the Partnership for Healthy Weight Management, said they hope consumers will use the guidelines when choosing weight-loss programs. Americans spend about $33 billion a year in their efforts to shed pounds.

The government could impose regulations if the industry ignores the voluntary guidelines, which the coalition worked on for a year.

"We are very happy that we have gotten this far," said Lynn McAfee, of the Philadelphia-based Council on Size & Weight Discrimination.

The guidelines suggest that companies alert consumers that "most people who lose weight are likely to find it difficult to keep the weight off."

The industry, consumer groups and health professionals are far from agreeing on whether they can come up with an accurate measure of typical weight loss.

"We've been struggling with these issues, but we realize there's not a one-size-fits-all disclosure," said Warren Dennis, outside general counsel for the Jenny Craig program.

"We think a lot of these disclosures are meaningless."

Dennis said the results of weight-loss programs vary so much from individual to individual and are dependent on so many factors that determining their effectiveness is extremely difficult. It's even tough to figure out how many people successfully maintain their weight loss after a few years, he said.

Consumer advocates disagree.

"We feel the companies have a good idea about how much their clients lose on average," said Bruce Silverglade, director of legal affairs at the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

"This is not rocket science," Silverglade said.

The guidelines seek to put more upfront information in consumers' hands.

Providers of weight-loss services or products, including physicians, nutritionists and commercial centers, are asked to give clients a detailed description of program contents, goals and staff qualifications.

They should provide an estimate of total costs, including mandatory food purchases or medical tests required by the program.

Heavy emphasis is placed on giving consumers information about the health risks of obesity, trying to shift the focus away from dropping pounds solely for cosmetic reasons.

"People enter weight-loss programs because they want to lose a whole lot of weight to be a size six or eight. They don't want to hear that just losing 20 pounds has health benefits," said Tracy Fox, a registered dietitian with the American Dietetic Association's government affairs office.

The National Institutes of Health says about 55 percent of American adults are overweight or obese — up from 43 percent in 1960. The extra weight can mean increased risk of heart disease, high blood pressure, diabetes, stroke, gallbladder disease, arthritis, sleep and breathing problems and some types of cancer.

"It's easy to talk about looking better,

The National Institutes of Health says about 55 percent of American adults are overweight or obese-up from 43 percent in 1960. The extra weight can mean increased risk of heart disease, high blood pressure, diabetes, stroke, gallbladder disease, arthritis, sleep and breathing problems and some types of cancer.

but when your health is involved it's not quite as easy," said Harry Greene, medical director for Slim Fast Foods. "Having agreed to this, we'll be much more forthright on giving out information on the health benefits of weight loss."

Slim Fast, Jenny Craig and Novartis Nutrition Corp., which runs the Optifast plan, were among the coalition's industry participants.

Companies also should inform consumers of risks associated with the weight-loss programs, the FTC said. For example, losing weight too rapidly can increase dangers of developing gallbladder disease.

Industry leaders believe that following the guidelines will not amount to a significant change of practice, particularly since many of them already are under consent orders with the government that prevent them from making false claims about their products.

Some worry that smaller operations — making more outlandish promises — won't follow suit.

"What the FTC hopes is that the competitive pressures will drive other companies in the industry to follow," said Silverglade, who expressed doubts this would happen without mandatory regulations.

Jenny Craig also is asking the commission to step up enforcement of the worst offenders.

Weapons bill discussed

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Supporters of a bill allowing Kansans to carry concealed handguns told legislators on Tuesday the bill is necessary for self-defense and would not increase crime.

An Overland Park, Kan. woman told the House Federal and State Affairs Committee that a gun could have prevented her from being raped in 1995.

"I'm now one of those three of four women who is a victim of violent crime," she said. "If we value women, then we must give them, not prevent them from making, choices on how to protect their lives."

The bill would allow the Kansas Bureau of Investigation to issue licenses allowing people to carry concealed handguns starting Jan. 1, 2000.

Applicants would have to be 21 or older, complete a weapons safety and training course, have no felony convictions and have no history of mental illness or drug and alcohol abuse in the previous five years.

Chairperson Susan Wagle, R-Wichita, said she expects the committee to endorse the bill next week. An endorsement would send the bill to the House for debate.

Gov. Bill Graves vetoed a similar bill in 1997 and Graves' spokesperson, Mike Matson, has said the governor has not changed his position.

Dr. Eric Voth of Topeka and others at the hearing disputed claims that the bill would lead to more crime. They cited studies that suggest crime has dropped in states that have legalized concealed weapons.

"This bill is not a license for simply anyone to carry a gun, and it's certainly not an invitation to a Wild West show," Voth said.

Presidential candidates seek funding

■ Winning in 2000 takes more than political skill; fund-raising begins early.

By JONATHAN D. SALANT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Determined to pass the first test of the presidency, John Kasich surveyed two dozen lawyers, developers and executives gathered in a Boston boardroom and made his pitch: "I need you."

He asked them to raise money — $10,000, $20,000 apiece — to put punch in his campaign for the Republican presidential nomination. Within days, the Ohio congressman made similar pleas to the well-heeled in New York and New Jersey.

In the year before the first primaries, it is dollars, not votes, that presidential contenders must campaign for. Politicians and strategists say a candidate needs to raise $20 million by the end of this year to properly finance a campaign in 2000.

That's $2,283 for every hour of every day in 1999.

Recalling his recent fund-raising forays, Kasich said that for the son of a mailman, gathering that huge sum is "comparable to climbing Mount Everest without oxygen."

Scaling the $20 million mountain early is crucial. Large states like New York and California have moved next year's primaries to early March, leaving candidates little time to convert strong performances in the early contests into campaign cash.

"This is the year of the invisible primary," said James Thurber, director of American University's Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies. "You really have to have the money in the bank in order to be competitive. You can't go out and collect money in the middle of campaigning."

At least one potential GOP candidate, Elizabeth Dole, is raising money before filing with the Federal Election Commission, using a provision that allows aspirants to gauge support in advance of a full-fledged candidacy.

As he did in 1996, millionaire publisher Steve Forbes can finance his campaign by writing checks rather than raising money. For the others, raising the $20 million is "a big test," former Vice President Dan Quayle said.

Making the test trickier, federal election laws require that the money come in chunks no larger than $1,000 per donor.

Democratic fund-raiser Terence McAuliffe said a successful presidential campaign needs a base of at least 100 people who can raise $50,000 each.

"You could care less about a guy who can give $100,000," said McAuliffe, who was finance chairman for President Clinton's re-election campaign. "It is the individual who has the ability to tap their neighbors, their friends, their relatives. You have got to create an army of true believers who are going to spend all day calling people on the telephone, asking for money."

To assemble that army, a candidate's money people seek out veteran fund-raisers, old friends, new friends and friends of friends. Many fund-raisers

"Ego plays a tremendous part in this business," McAuliffe said. "To say they've just had dinner with the president plays a huge role."

Small contributions raised through phones and mail also are important. Most candidates agree to limit the amount of money they spend in primaries — $37 million in 1996 — making them eligible for federal matching funds of up to $250 per contributor.

are real estate developers, contractors, investors, lawyers or small-business owners — folks who come with long lists of clients, vendors or associates they can ask for money.

The script has the candidate join a small group in a room, or at least get on the telephone with potential donors, to seal the deal.

"They have to feel like he cares enough that he picked up the phone and called them. And if they called him back two weeks later, he would take the call," Quayle's chief fund-raiser, Richard Norman, said.

In Boston, Kasich met over coffee and cola with a group gathered by one of his fund-raisers, former Massachusetts GOP Chairman Jim Rappaport. With windows overlooking the Charles River as his backdrop, Kasich followed his pitch for money by fielding questions about tax cuts, the budget and Clinton's impeachment.

Some big fund-raisers hope one day to bring their issues directly to the next president or one of his top aides. Others want nothing more than an autographed picture to hang on the wall.

While only $250 of a $1,000 contribution is matched, small donors' dollars are doubled by the government.

"Direct mail is an emotional medium," Norman said. "You've got to use some pretty emotional language to talk someone into pulling out their checkbook when they don't even know you."

Hence Quayle's January fund-raising letter, which takes a poke at Texas Gov. George W. Bush: "I have ordered my staff to never — EVER — utter the words 'compassionate conservatism.' This silly and insulting term was created by liberal Republicans and is nothing more than code for surrendering our values and principles."

Preparing for another round of fund raising, Kasich said money matters too much in presidential politics.

"The huge sums make it disproportionately important," Kasich said. "It takes away from the process of electing a president."

Once In A Lifetime
Sharing your engagement and wedding announcements
in the Collegian the first Friday of every month
Your engagement and wedding are special moments in your life and the Kansas State Collegian wants to help you share the news with family and friends. This semester you can put your announcement with a picture in the Collegian's "Once in a Lifetime" special section for FREE.
"Once in a Lifetime" runs the first Friday of every month: Oct. 3, Nov. 6 and Dec. 4. It will resume in the spring semester with the following publication dates: Feb. 5, March 5, April 2 and May 7.
To publish your announcement, please complete the attached form and mail it or take it to Student Publications, Kedzie 103 (east of the K-State Student Union). The deadline for getting your announcement in the paper will be the Wednesday preceding the publication date.

To place a FREE engagement or wedding announcement in the Collegian, complete and submit the following form with a photo to Kedzie 103.

Student-to-adviser ratios also provide for a better relationship and a more personalized approach, Elwick said.

Melvin said he agreed. "Sure, we're smaller," Melvin said. "But I think we definitely can do more to be sure graduates get through the program and get placed in a good job."

Another area K-State-Salina is improving is student life.

For the first time, the Student Governing Association at K-State-Salina includes an activities committee, similar to Manhattan's Union Program Council. Until this year, there was no organization of student activities.

Lebron said campus involvement underwent a face-lift as planned events brought students together. The number of clubs on campus has doubled this year because of student interest, and a recent virtual reality activity brought in 200 participants. That makes up almost 25 percent of enrolled students.

"I think what this campus does for its size is something I'm not so sure other campuses do," Lebron said. "To have so many students involved says a lot about the direction this college is moving."

Upcoming events include a chain-saw juggler, a free movie night, free pizza at the Student Activities Center and possibly free bowling and a formal dance.

"Students have a need to be involved on campus," Lebron said. "They want to have a social life and have fun. If there are opportunities for them, they'll do better in the classroom because they feel more satisfied."

Student government opportunities also have expanded. SGA previously consisted of eight senators. Now there are 18, in addition to executive members.

Another aspect of campus life seeing change is the residence halls. This is the first year the campus has a Hall Governing Board.

"It's hard to go with something you've never had to work with before," Nick Smith, the first HGB president, said. "There's no manual written on what you have to do. The advantage is by not having something set up, you get to form it to your own expectations."

Smith said his main goal is to have HGB be a voice for student in residence halls to get involved and make changes.

Residence Hall, which opened in 1997, and Harbin Hall, which opened in fall 1998, are suite-style, and the only problem HGB has addressed is finding ways for improved lighting.

"More and more people are voicing their opinions and starting to get involved," said activities chair Aggie Lang, senior in computer science technology management. "To keep traditions and things going at K-State-Salina, we need leadership to keep getting better. It's coming."

announced plans to vote to convict Clinton or that any Republican had declared an intention to vote for acquittal.

Democrats pressed their effort for a formal Senate censure of Clinton, but many Republicans were opposed and prospects seemed doubtful. "I think censure has a tough row to hoe," said Sen. John Chafee of Rhode Island, one of a few GOP lawmakers to have announced support.

The first Democrat to speak in the closed Senate session was Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. The Democrats spoke by seniority; Republicans used a sign-up sheet.

The Senate's senior Democrat, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, who has suggested he could vote either way, chose to wait rather than claim the right to speak first among lawmakers in his own party.

With his fate being debated in the Senate, Clinton traveled to western Virginia for a meeting with House Democrats having their annual retreat.

Rep. Robert Menendez of New Jersey, a member of the House Democratic leadership, said the president never overtly mentioned impeachment. But, "He said, 'Thank you for all the support you've given me over time, going back to 1993, and I'm committed to you in your efforts to achieve a majority'" in the elections in 2000.

Under Senate rules, lawmakers can deliberate for up to 25 hours, with 15 minutes allotted to each senator to speak. Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-

"WHAT WE COULD END UP HAVING BY THE END OF THE WEEK IS A BIPARTISAN ACQUITTAL, WHICH I'M AFRAID COULD LEAD TO A GOOD DEAL OF CELEBRATING DOWNTOWN."

— SEN. MITCH MCCONNELL, R-KY.

Miss., preached the virtue of brevity, noting that Lincoln's Gettysburg address lasted but three minutes and John F. Kennedy's famed inaugural address scarcely seven.

An effort led by Democrats and Texas Republican Kay Bailey Hutchison to open the proceedings failed — it gained a 59-41 majority but was short of the two-thirds needed — with the GOP leadership helping to stiffen the opposition.

Closed-door deliberations are more conducive to thoughtful exchanges, Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said. "Sometimes a discussion breaks out. If it's in closed session, you will see more of a dialogue. If there's going to be any persuasion it's only going to be in closed session." Despite his remarks, Kyl voted to open the doors.

One Republican senator said he hoped by closing the deliberations the Senate would be able to engage in a candid, nonpartisan discussion of a proposal to censure Clinton after his presumed acquittal.

Democrats have been leading the censure effort, with the support of a small number of Republicans.

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, lent her support during the day. A spokesman said she had succeeded in inserting language in a proposal under consideration to make it clear that Clinton would be treated like any other citizen after he leaves office — a time when the government decides whether to prosecute him for any alleged crime.

Another Republican, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said many GOP senators oppose censure, but he said he might be receptive as a way of dousing any plans for celebration at the White House. "What we could end up having by the end of the week is a bipartisan acquittal, which I'm afraid could lead to a good deal of celebrating downtown," he said.

Presidential spokesman Joe Lockhart has already declared that the White House will be a "gloat-free zone" after the Senate takes its votes. Republicans, in particular, were offended by Clinton's campaign-style appearance at the White House with Democratic lawmakers hours after the House voted last December to impeach him.

With one or two possible exceptions, the Senate's 45 Democrats are expected to vote for Clinton's acquittal on both charges — perjury and obstruction of justice. Most of the 55 Republicans are expected to vote for conviction, although several GOP senators have said in recent days the article of impeachment alleging perjury, in particular, could fail to achieve a majority vote.

With the end of the historic trial only days away, Republicans moved to tie up loose ends.

Lott dispatched a letter to Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr containing what Republican officials said was information about a possible White House taping system that might have picked up, by telephone, conversations between Clinton and Lewinsky. "All I've done is make available information sent to me," Lott told reporters. He said he has had that information for about a week and discussed it with the GOP caucus.

White House spokesman Lockhart has denied the existence of such a system.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., sought permission to have the Senate issue subpoenas for three individuals who have cast doubt on trial testimony given last week by White House aide Sidney Blumenthal.

Democratic Leader Tom Daschle objected, however. Republicans, who are eager to wrap up the trial without further political damage, let the matter die rather than demand a vote by the full Senate.

In his testimony, Blumenthal denied that he had passed to the news media Clinton's false account from January 1998 about his relationship with Lewinsky.

Specter's motion sought to allow exploration of "possible fraud on the Senate by alleged perjury" on the part of the White House aide.

Falwell claims purple TV character is gay

By DAVID REED
The Associated Press

ROANOKE, Va. — The Rev. Jerry Falwell is trying to out Tinky Winky, suggesting that the purple, purse-toting character on television's popular "Teletubbies" children's show is gay.

A spokesman for Itsy Bitsy Entertainment Co., which licenses the Teletubbies in the United States, said the purse is actually Tinky Winky's magic bag.

"The fact that he carries a magic bag doesn't make him gay," Steve Rice said. "It's a children's show, folks. To think we would be putting sexual innuendo in a children's show is kind of outlandish."

The February edition of the National Liberty Journal, edited and published by Falwell, contains an article warning parents that the Teletubby with the triangular antenna might be a gay role model.

To support its claim, the publication said Tinky Winky has the voice of a boy but carries a purse. "He is purple — the gay-pride color, and his antenna is shaped like a triangle — the gay-pride symbol."

Falwell said the "subtle depictions" are intentional and issued a statement Tuesday that said, "As a Christian, I feel that role modeling the gay lifestyle is damaging to the moral lives of children."

The British show aimed at toddlers began airing on U.S. public television stations last spring. The Teletubbies are portrayed by actors in oversized, brightly colored costumes. They all have television screens on their tummies.

Rice said Falwell was attacking "something sweet and innocent" to further his conservative political agenda.

Falwell's spokeswoman, Laura Swickard, said the founder of the now-defunct Moral Majority agreed with everything that was in the NLJ article and would not comment beyond his one-paragraph statement.

TUBAS

think it was normal for us to be taking pictures of people with tubas around town," Peterson said. "We really didn't get any weird stares."

Members of the tuba section took the photographs and did the design work for the calendar. All the design work was done on a personal computer. Peterson said work on the calendar began in September and was completed in November.

Peterson said he didn't know how many hours it took to make the calendar.

"It would be hard to guess," he said. "Time flies when you're having fun."

A holiday or birthday is listed on each day of every month in the calendar. Birthdays of all tuba players and band events are included in the calendar. Dates such as "National Tomb Sweeping Day" and "Lumpy Rug Day" also are included.

"We got together and sat around with a large almanac of different holidays," Kirk Mead, sophomore in open-option, said. "It was a lot of fun picking them out."

Mead said people would enjoy the calendar.

headache" instead of "I don't feel like having sex," he said.

Dr. Domeena Renshaw, a Chicago-area sex therapist, said the results are not surprising considering the long list of couples waiting to get into the sexual dysfunction clinic she has run at the Loyola University Medical Center since 1972.

In that time, she has treated nearly 140 couples who had never consummated their marriages, including a couple who had been wed for 23 years.

Study co-author Raymond Rosen, co-director of the Center for Sexual and

"We do some pretty crazy stuff," he said. "Hopefully, people will have as much fun looking at it as we did preparing it."

Money from the calendars goes to buy items for the tuba section. This year the section purchased jackets with "KSU Tubas" on the back. The money also covers expenses the band budget does not cover.

"In our section, we have to wear gloves all of the time, and we end up going through quite a few in a year," Tom Boggs, senior in biology, said. "Other sections in the band don't have the amount of expenses that the tuba section does."

Boggs said he is happy with the success of the calendar, and 200 have been sold.

"This is twice of what we sold last year, so we're happy with it," he said.

Boggs said they are planning to produce a calendar next year and would like to use a professional photographer. The best reason to buy the calendar is to support the band, Mead said.

"The calendar really helps to get our name out, which I think is important, and all the proceeds go back to support the tuba section," Mead said.

The calendars cost $15 and are available from Peterson.

Marital Health at the Robert Wood Johnson Medical School in New Brunswick, N.J., said the survey provides much-needed information about women, who have often been excluded from studies about sexual performance.

He said the findings are the most reliable since Dr. Alfred Kinsey did his landmark studies 50 years ago.

Kinsey got similar results regarding impotence and failure to achieve orgasm but didn't ask about lack of sexual desire.

Too often, Rosen said, Americans have gotten their information about sex from magazines bought at the grocery-store checkout.

"As a scientist, it makes my hair stand on end," Rosen said. "It's terrible."

Records of Tri-Delt hazing violation released

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Delta Delta Delta sorority pleaded guilty to violating the Greek Affairs hazing policy during house activities on Oct. 26, 1998, according to documents released by the Office of the University Attorney this week.

Three pieces of correspondence among representatives of Tri-Delt, the sorority's national office and Panhellenic Council were released by Jennifer Kassebaum, associate university attorney Tuesday. The letters detail allegations made against the sorority for new member activities last fall. They also list the punishments imposed against Tri-Delt after a December hearing with the council.

According to a letter from council

President Lindsey Roy to former chapter president Lori West, Tri-Delt was in violation of the physical abuse and improper requirements sections of the Greek Affairs policy.

The policy defines physical abuse as "any action taken or situation created which may cause pain, injury or undue physical stress, fatigue or discomfort."

Examples of abuse include paddle swats of any nature, including the "trading of swats" with active members, according to the letter.

Improper requirements or obligations are defined as, "conducting quests, treasure hunts, scavenger hunts, paddle hunts, big sister hunts or little sister hunts that include illegal activity, physical abuse or psychological abuse," according to the policy.

After the Dec. 1 hearing, the Panhellenic Council Executive Board agreed with the guilty plea of the chapter and supported the sanctions imposed by Tri-Delt's national organization.

The sanctions limit the sorority's social functions and require the implementation of various education programs. The house is on social probation until January 2000.

The letters were released Tuesday after requests from the Collegian.

Greek Affairs adviser Barb Robel said the board hadn't previously released the documents so it could stay consistent with its policy.

"We never release judiciary documents," she said. "That's private business."

Robel said she didn't think that not releasing the documents to the public gave the greek system the idea that hazing policies were not enforced.

"Everyone knew that action was taken," she said.

Roy said some information was initially released to dispel rumors about what actually took place, but the board didn't want to release details because someone might get hurt.

"It's been our policy of confidentiality," she said. "We really felt like we were doing the right thing."

Roy said Greek Affairs tries to make sure members know there is no tolerance for hazing.

The following are the sanctions imposed by the national organization:

■ One social event with non-members per month for the 1998-99 academic year.

■ One social event with members per month. The events must be alcohol free.

■ Discuss Standards of Excellence during a chapter meeting before Jan. 15, 1999, and make a plan for meeting each standard. Then, the Officers' Council had to prepare in detail how the plans would be met.

■ The collegiate district officer must visit the chapter and give a mandatory hazing workshop for all members, and minutes must be taken.

■ Sponsor an educational workshop on hazing and alcohol awareness for the entire greek community at K-State.

■ Submit complete plans for Bid Day activities, new member activities and initiation to the collegiate district officer and collegiate coordinator before Aug. 1, 1999.

■ In fall 1999, all chapter members and new members need to sign the Obligations of Membership and Statement of Financial Obligation.

Panhellenic Council did not impose additional sanctions on the chapter.

"We have been fortunate enough to negotiate with two credible organizations, Tri-Delt nationals and Panhellenic Council, who have been eager to resolve the situation both pro-actively and effectively," Tri-Delt President Angie Shields said. "We have no further comments."

Katherine Helms, chapter service coordinator for Tri-Delt's national office, did not return phone calls.

Rowdy Trouty's bartender Tiffany Whyte serves a drink to a patron of the bar Tuesday night in Aggieville. Though many people might think immediately of bars when they think of Aggieville, drinking establishments make up only about one-third of the businesses in the shopping district. A laundry delivering service was the first business to occupy the land that is today's Aggieville.

KJ's loses liquor license, plans appeal

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alcoholic Beverage Control revoked the liquor license of KJ's Bar and Dance Club on Feb. 3 due to 15 minor in possession violations.

Jeff Fellows, the owner and operating manager of KJ's, was ordered to pay $5,300 in fines. He is appealing the decision to the Secretary of the Department of Revenue, which oversees ABC.

"I don't know exactly what my options are," Fellows said. "I'd have to talk to my lawyer. I'm still going through appeals."

Until the appeals process is over, KJ's can remain open. Fellows' attorney, Troy Huser, said appeals could last indefinitely.

"This will not affect the daily operations of the bar for the next couple of weeks, probably months," Huser said. "We haven't received the paperwork yet. Even after the paperwork gets here, we have a period where we can file an appeal."

If the appeal to the Department of Revenue is rejected, Fellows can appeal to the court system, including the district court, the court of appeals and the Kansas Supreme Court.

"I'm not saying that's where we're going," Huser said. "We'll just have to examine our position at each stage of the process."

KJ's, one of the few 18-and-over bars in Aggieville, has received 15 MIP violations since Fellows took over the bar in August 1997. ABC's revocation order is based on a new penalty structure that was implemented in July 1998. That structure calls for an establishment's license to be revoked after the ninth offense, which means, pending appeal, Fellows would never be able to get another liquor license in Kansas.

"The penalty structure speaks for itself," said Sheila Walker, public information officer for the Department of Revenue. "Licensees who continue to violate the law are the ones suffering the consequences."

Fellows, however, said the fine structure was unfair. "Believe me, I'm not the only bar in this town that has over nine violations," he said. "They restructured the fines, and KJ's is the only bar in trouble."

Neither Fellows nor Huser would explain what particular aspect of the revocation they intend to challenge.

"We could challenge violations, we could challenge

Wooing? Brush up on grammar first BUFFALO, N.Y. — Nicole Urdang's suitor poured his heart through his pen onto every inch of the paper. He wrote not one page, but 12. And not one string of words, but two, filling each lined space, so great was his devotion.

Urdang read and read. And read and read and read and read.

"It was so annoying. There are no words to say how annoying," she said.

Ouch.

Had the suitor known. Everlasting love is one thing; a never-ending love letter is quite another. Two pages max is the rule.

Oh yes, ye smitten ones. There are rules.

Urdang, a psychotherapist who navigates couples through rough relationship waters, shares love letter-writing guidelines — just in time for Valentine's Day — at a seminar offered through Just Buffalo Literary Center.

A full class of eight — six men and two women — signed on for the three-hour tutorial in what, in this age of e-mail, might be a dying art. Will there ever be more like Elizabeth Barrett Browning's sonnets to her husband: "How do I love thee? Let me count the ways ...?"

It's 6 a.m. The smell of donuts wafts through the air. Coffee is brewing.

At 8 a.m., retail stores change their closed signs to open. Customers slowly start drifting in and out.

By noon the lunch crowd has invaded. Soon the shops start closing, and the lunch crowd turns into the dinner crowd.

Around 9 p.m., music can be heard coming from some of the buildings. A younger crowd fills the sidewalks. Cars fill the parking lots and the side streets.

At 1:30 a.m., the music is still playing, but the crowd has died down. "Last call" can be heard through the open doorways.

It's 3 a.m. Finally, the music is off, the sound of laughter has disappeared. For a few hours it will be peaceful in the streets until the smell of donuts wafts through the air again to start a new day.

This is Aggieville. Described as one of the most unique shopping districts in the state of Kansas by Aggieville Business Association Director Cheryl Sieben, it's one of the few districts open 20 hours a day.

A laundry delivering service was the first business on land that was a swamp much of the year according to the December 16, 1923's Morning Chronicle.

Since then, Aggieville has grown to about 120 businesses 110 years later.

Living out a dream

Aggieville isn't filled with big-chain retail stores. A small business atmosphere is what customers are greeted with.

"I like it that we're a small-business oriented shopping district," Sieben said. "Aggieville is the place to be able to come and start a new idea."

People who have dreams of owning their own business can come to Aggieville because it adapts well to new ideas, Sieben said.

"Not everybody makes it, but we have success stories," she said.

Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky BrewGrille and Mighty Fine Doughnuts, said he came from the Los Angeles area to Manhattan so he could own his own businesses.

"It's a perfect destination for what we really try to do here," he said.

And, what they are really trying to do is provide a safe and fun shopping and dining experience for residents of Manhattan, and open up opportunity to other business owners trying to get started, said Dan Walter, author of "Aggieville 1889-1989 — 100 Years of the Aggieville Tradition."

"I think Aggieville is a special shopping district because the business owners are primarily the little guys living out a dream," Walter said.

The misconception

Bars. Alcohol. Drunks. These might be the first thoughts connected to Aggieville.

"It's probably what we're known for at night," Sieben said.

Sieben said she wants to educate the community that Aggieville is more than just bars.

"To the average student's eye, it's a place to go eat and bars," Walter said.

Actually, bars only make up one-third of the businesses in Aggieville, Sieben said.

"It is what makes us, but we're so much more

Three GOP senators say they'll vote against impeachment

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Three Republican senators declared Wednesday they would vote to acquit President Clinton of both articles of impeachment, the clearest sign yet as the trial neared an end that the charges would fall far short of conviction and possibly even shy of a bare majority.

Sens. James Jeffords of Vermont,

Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John Chafee of Rhode Island — moderate lawmakers from the Northeast — were the first Republicans to announce opposition to both articles, perjury and obstruction of justice in the Monica Lewinsky affair.

At the same time, a Democratic drive to censure Clinton sputtered under Republican opposition. As a second day of closed-door deliberations ended, Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut said that if GOP leaders thwart efforts to force a censure vote, supporters might simply draft a declaration condemning the president's behavior and circulate it for senators to sign.

Jeffords said enough Republicans might vote against the articles of impeachment to keep the final roll calls on Thursday or Friday short of even 51 votes, although he subsequently softened his prediction. "The pressure is coming on to get a majority," he said.

A spokesman for Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., said there had been no attempt by the leadership to line up votes for conviction. Lott issued a statement at mid-afternoon declaring that the evidence "shows that the president has committed perjury and obstructed justice. The only question left is, will the Senate vote to find him guilty of committing these high crimes."

Only a constitutional two-thirds — 67 votes in the 100-member

Senate — could convict and oust Clinton, the second president in history to be put on trial.

As the Senate plodded through a second day of closed-door deliberations, Jeffords said Clinton "gave misleading statements ... did obstruct justice, but his actions in this case do not reach the high standard of impeachment."

A short while later, Specter said

Trainees come from abroad to take part in annual event

K-State's Department of Military Science will be the host of 90 international military trainees today, as part of an annual cooperative event with the U.S. Army's Command and General Staff College.

The officers come from 75 countries, some from Europe and the former Soviet Union. They will participate in a 12-month training program at the Command and General Staff College in Leavenworth, Kan., starting this June.

The purpose of this yearlong program is to provide them with an overview of how the military operates under a democratic system. After the program is completed, the officers will return to their countries and apply the techniques they have learned.

Former President Dwight D. Eisenhower is the only American to graduate from this program; other graduates have become foreign heads of state, government ministers and ambassadors.

Before visiting K-State, the officers visited the Kansas Statehouse and met with members from the Kansas House of Representatives. They will tour the military science department at K-State and hear presentations from the Army ROTC program and the departments of Grain Science and Industry and Animal Science and Industry.

Ellen Bogdan, training and information coordinator at Ft. Leavenworth, said the trip is an informational program and its teachings will be shared with the other 1,000 U.S. officers at the Command and General Staff College.

The officers will learn how military officer training is incorporated into university education and the roles of public service and research, said Robert Hudgens, assistant dean of international agricultural programs.

"We're an agricultural state, and they are interested in the role we play and how the university fits into the system," Hudgens said.

Man sentenced for dealing 330 pounds of cocaine

TOPEKA — A man who, admitted distributing more than 330 pounds of cocaine in Topeka over a four-month period has been sentenced to 20 years in federal prison without parole.

Gerardo Juarez-Lozano, 37, of Topeka, was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Judge Richard Rogers.

U.S. Attorney Jackie Williams said Juarez-Lozano pleaded guilty in September to conspiracy to possess more than 11 pounds of cocaine with intent to distribute it. Williams said he admitted supplying the larger amount of cocaine to other individuals in Topeka between November 1996 and February 1997.

Committee endorses plan to raise education spending

TOPEKA — The Senate Education Committee on Wednesday endorsed a plan to add $8.6 million to Gov. Bill Graves' proposed public education spending.

The funding measure now goes to the Senate for debate and a vote.

The committee's plan would raise the base amount of per-pupil state aid to the state's 305 public school districts in fiscal year 2000 to $3,770, which is $15 more than Graves' proposed $3,755. The base state aid now is $3,720 per pupil.

The bill would increase elementary and secondary education spending in the 1999-2000 school year by $96.2 million, whereas the governor's plan would add $87.6 million.

The committee also endorsed a proposal to request that the Senate Ways and Means Committee recommend adding $1 million in spending to train teachers.

Sen. Janis Lee, D-Kensington, said after the hearing that she cast the only vote against the bill because it didn't raise per-pupil spending enough, and that the increase is likely to be reduced by the Senate or House.

"I think that by the time we get the negotiations through the House and Senate, we'll be lucky to have $35" in additional per-pupil spending, Lee said.

At a news conference, Graves said he would have to wait until revised revenue projections are released in April before he could advocate increasing per-pupil spending beyond what he proposed last month in his recommended state budget.

"I don't think there's any problem with the Legislature discussing what its priorities would be in spending areas, given that those dollars are available by the end of the session. But I don't think they are decisions that we would prudently make today," Graves said.

At the hearing, Lee questioned relying on $6.1 million from a multistate tobacco settlement for educational spending. The money from the settlement is being held in escrow.

"What happens if the tobacco money doesn't come through?" Lee asked.

U.S., British planes strike Iraqi air defenses — again

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. and British warplanes struck several Iraqi air defense sites Wednesday after three waves of Iraqi fighters violated the southern no-fly zone in the first clash in a week, U.S. military officials said.

Iraqi planes and anti-aircraft missile batteries didn't target the Western jets, but U.S. and British pilots fired on the air defense systems to remove a potential danger, said Navy Lt. Cmdr. Ernest Duplessis, a spokesman for U.S. Central Command in Florida.

"Any time we have a violation of the no-fly zone, that is a threat," Duplessis said.

Coalition aircraft included more than half a dozen U.S. Air Force F-15E fighters and A-10 jets with enough firepower to take out tanks as well as several British GR-1 Tornado fighter-bombers. All returned safely to base after separate attacks over the course of about eight hours, the Pentagon said.

The official Iraqi News Agency reported the strikes killed a civilian and injured others. U.S. officials said a damage assessment had not been completed.

The Western warplanes used precision-guided missiles and 500 and 1,000 pound bombs — although U.S. officials didn't say how many — to hit missile batteries, radar sites and a communications tower, U.S. defense officials said.

The incidents occurred near Talil, about 170 miles southeast of Baghdad, and near An Najaf, about 100 miles south of Baghdad. The Western aircraft first struck between 2:30 a.m. and 4:30 a.m. EST and in a second wave at about 11 a.m. EST, U.S. officials said.

In the three separate violations, pairs of Russian-made MiG-23 or MiG-25 jets entered about 60 miles into the no-fly zone, but turned tail when confronted, the Pentagon said.

Western planes have hit about 40 air defense sites in response to more than 80 violations of the flight-denial zones, set up after the 1991 Gulf War to protect Iraqi minority groups and rebels.

Peace talks yet to address issue of NATO deployment

RAMBOUILLET, France — After four days of talks, ethnic Albanian rebels and rival Serbs still were divided Wednesday on a peace plan for Kosovo, and mediators have yet to broach the toughest part — NATO deployment in the province.

Serb-led Yugoslavia is demanding a formal pledge to keep the country's borders intact, sources from both sides said, while Albanian negotiators are calling for a referendum on independence, an immediate cease-fire and NATO guarantees for the eventual interim settlement.

The Kosovo Liberation Army said it would not give up its battle for independence for the province, where more than 2,000 people have died and tens of thousands have fled their homes in a year of fighting.

The warring parties were forced into talks by the threat of NATO airstrikes on Yugoslavia, made up of Serbia and the smaller republic of Montenegro, and toughened measures to cut off weapons and financing to the Kosovo rebels.

The effort to bring peace to Serbia is going on in two areas: peace talks at this French chateau and at NATO headquarters in Brussels, plans are being made to send up to 30,000 troops into Kosovo. Britain and France already have volunteered troops, and President Clinton said he is considering sending up to 4,000 American soldiers.

The Serbs said they will never allow foreign troops on their soil. The Americans said if they don't, NATO will bomb Serbia. Russia, a party to the talks here, opposes military action.

At Southwestern Bell, we believe the open marketplace works best

It doesn't really matter what kind of service you're providing. Whether it's fresh vegetables or advanced telecommunications, it's been proven time and time again: an open marketplace with fair competition works best.

It works best for vendors, who can draw on their strengths to compete — one may have the broadest variety, another, the most efficient service, a third, the lowest prices.

But even more importantly, an open marketplace works for customers, who may choose a vendor based on their needs.

For more than 115 years, Southwestern Bell has been working to give Kansans outstanding local telephone service. We've done our best to give you the best service and the lowest prices that we could under the regulatory system.

That system changed with passage of the 1996 Federal Telecommunications Act, which was meant to open up the telecommunications industry nationwide.

Since then, Southwestern Bell has been working to show how much more we can do in an open marketplace, given the opportunity.

But the marketplace isn't fulfilling its potential — yet. Kansans are beginning to see some of the benefits of telecommunications competition — but not all of them. For example, Southwestern Bell has invested millions of dollars to upgrade our state's telecommunications network and provide support for innovative new programs in Kansas schools, libraries and hospitals. Today, almost 60 companies may compete with Southwestern Bell for local telephone customers. But even more work must be done to let the free market do its job.

Soon, Kansans should be able to have even more telecommunications providers and products to choose from and the low prices that come with open competition. The Kansas Corporation Commission has a role to play to advance creation of an open marketplace. It's time for us — and every other telephone company that wants to compete — to have that opportunity. It's time to trust in the power of the marketplace.

Southwestern Bell is ready to help move Kansas forward, so customers have access to the benefits of real competition for local and long-distance service.

Engineering students prepare for solar-powered car competition

Race lets engineering students put classroom skills to practical use.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is working with the sun again this year, building a solar-powered car to race in the 1999 Sunrayce, a biennial intercollegiate competition to design and build race cars.

Norman Dillman, professor of electrical engineering, said the race is designed to build a high-tech car from the bottom up, with the ability to run by the sun.

This year's Sunrayce will be from Washington D.C., to Orlando, Fla., beginning June 20.

The qualifier will be April 29 in Milford, Mich.

Damian Brandenburg, junior in mechanical engineering, said during the qualifier, judges will inspect the cars and make sure they are safe to drive. Each team will drive a 100-mile race requiring a certain average speed. As many as 40 teams will then qualify for the race in June.

"This gives us practical experience to apply after we graduate,"

Brandenburg said. "We get to see the entire project and how the small aspects affect the large project."

In 1997, the first time K-State entered in Sunrayce, 70 teams were entered. Out of this number, 36 qualified, with K-State finishing 24th in the race.

Dillman said this placement was good for the first year, but the winning car doesn't depend on the speed. It depends on reliability.

"The car that won in '97 won because it never broke down," Dillman said. "If your car breaks down, it will not win."

The cost of this year's car is about $250,000.

Most of the cost comes in the form of donations and the rest comes from individual contributions, such as the Adapt-A-Solar Cell program.

Supporters can adopt a solar cell that will be on the car for $20. In this way, some of the expense for the construction can be relieved.

"This race creates publicity for alternate forms of energy," Dillman said.

"The race is exciting because the students are doing more than just book-learning."

Jason Northup, senior in mechanical engineering and project manager, said construction of the car is one month behind, but the car is already better than the one built in 1997.

"We learned a lot at the first race and there are areas we already have improved on," Northup said. "We have applied what we learned at the last race to the car we are working on now."

Twenty students are working on this year's car, most of whom are electrical or mechanical engineering majors. Fifty teams are registered for the qualifier in April.

Brandenburg said by having K-State participate in Sunrayce, it not only helps give recognition to the engineering department, but also gives practical, hands-on experience to students working on the car.

"We are getting to see the work completed and see other qualifying cars in the race and what they have accomplished," Brandenburg said.

Northup said two students will be involved in driving the car. He said the conditions in the car are not great because of the lack of modern conveniences.

"It is hot in the car and exhausting," Northup said. "It does not have a perfect interior like a Lincoln Town Car, and it has no air-conditioning."

Northup said Sunrayce is good for both the university and the students involved because it gives publicity to K-State and experience for those involved.

"It is great publicity to show how involved the school is and that we do interesting things outside the classroom," Northup said. "It gives students a chance to apply what they have learned by being involved with a project."

HANOVER, N.H. — Dartmouth College, the school that inspired "Animal House," plans to put an end to single-sex fraternities and sororities to foster more "respectful relations" between the sexes.

Dartmouth students were in an uproar Wednesday over the plan.

"This was like a bomb," said Misha Rosoff, 23, rush chairman at Sigma Alpha Epsilon. "Everyone sort of assumed that the trustees would try to get rid of the greek system, but this came with no warning."

Officials at the Ivy League school refused to say whether the plan means requiring fraternities and sororities to go coed or phasing them out altogether, but college President James Wright said it will be the biggest change in social life at Dartmouth since women were admitted in 1972.

The move, announced in a letter to students, is aimed at encouraging "respectful relations between women and men." College administrators said they are concerned about problem drinking and the social fragmentation that sometimes accompanies the greek system.

The college did not say specifically when the changes would be put into effect.

The details are to be worked out in consultation with students and backed with tens of millions of dollars for construction of new housing, dining and social areas to replace the greek houses.

In the end, the greek system "as we know it today will not continue," Wright said in an interview Wednesday.

Dartmouth, founded in 1769, has had fraternities for more than 158 years.

They are a significant part of the school's image and the social life in Hanover, a snowy town of about 7,000 people 135 miles from Boston. According to the student paper, The Dartmouth, more than 35 percent of the 4,300 undergraduates are members of 25 single-sex fraternities and sororities.

"The greek system is a very huge thing up here," said Brad Bingham, 22, a member of Alpha Delta.

"If there was a city or a bigger town with more things to do, maybe it wouldn't be so important."

"Every time they plant a tree or modify the curriculum they constantly have student meetings and discussions," said Catherine Curran, 19, sophomore and sorority member from Las Vegas. "For something this drastic, they should have gotten student input."

ternity or sorority who has allowed anyone in of another gender," Lewis said.

Something that could become a model for Dartmouth occurred at Middlebury College in Vermont in 1991, Middlebury spokesman Phil Benoit said.

The trustees there "basically said to the greek system houses, 'It's all right to remain here, but you must open membership to both genders,'" he said.

He said nearly all complied, though they changed names and affiliations.

Greek image hurt by closed hazing records

Four months passed until the Collegian found out the details of an October hazing incident involving the Delta Delta Delta sorority.

It wasn't for a lack of trying. On the contrary, reporters repeatedly contacted representatives from the sorority, its national organization, and Panhellenic Council and Greek Affairs adviser Barb Robel. But all of their responses seemed only to be rehearsed and evasive.

Finally, after calls to the Office of the University Attorney, the information was released.

All organizations — campus and otherwise — should understand that hiding problems does not create solutions.

Greek Affairs is right to want to protect the privacy of individual students. However, information can be released without naming the people involved. In fact, the details of the case the Collegian received omitted any such information.

What would have happened if Greek Affairs had been upfront about the situation? The Tri-Delt house's reputation would have been tarnished, but more importantly, greek and non-greek sources would have had access to the facts. That's necessary if the problem is ever to be solved.

At worst, the reputation probably would carry over into rush and the house might have fewer new members.

Rightfully so. Hazing should be punished, and greek houses should have to rebuild after committing such an offense.

On the other hand, when Greek Affairs tries to cover up the story, it drags the situation out until the news media finally finds out, making the situation worse publicly and failing to address a problem before the campus community.

The difference? It's better to admit mistakes and educate the public about what is being done to remedy the situation that it is to try to hide something, fail and give the appearance the problem isn't serious.

By evading public comment on the hazing incident and delaying public access to records, Greek Affairs sent the message that it is more concerned with its image than its members. The system's national ranking looks good in recruiting pamphlets — and is something to be proud of — but it's not a crutch that allows greeks to duck important issues that jeopardize the safety of members.

It's easy to say honesty is the best policy, but what matters is if that is the practice. Greek organizations should be willing to admit mistakes, in part to inform the campus community, but also to alert rushers.

That way it never happens again.

LEAVING LAS VEGAS ... ALONE

When it comes to Sin City, you have to know when to say when

I AM not quite sure when the realization hit me, but I know it was long before any real damage could be done.

After spending 3 1/2 days in Las Vegas for Super Bowl Weekend, I finally think I can put my finger on exactly what I felt during my trip into Sin City.

You can't win. Actually, it seems so simple now, but it's something no one ever says or really thinks about. Las Vegas is designed to make a loser out of every man and every woman who steps foot in the city.

Everyone goes to Las Vegas (or, more close to home, the nearby riverboats of Kansas City, Mo.) with dreams of finding fame and fortune. It's so easy to fall into that mindset. You see the money, you see the chips — they are all around you. It is easy to be overwhelmed by it all.

Everyone knows someone who knows someone who hit it big at either a high-stakes card table or big-money slot machine. These age-old stories fuel the fire underneath everyone's dreams of striking it rich in the profession of gambling.

All regular gamblers boast of their ways to beat the system. Each claims to hold a trick that makes them a winner each and every time.

The fact of the matter is that it just isn't true. There is no way to beat the system of gambling, because it's the best trick in the book.

Organized gambling has created a world that continues to lure people in with a system that clearly states a person has a better chance of losing their money than making money.

Think about it.

There is more than a 50-percent chance you will lose. Every time you lay a chip on the table, there is a better probability the dealer will take that chip than give you one in return.

It's like giving your worst enemies a $20 bill and then telling you there is a 60-percent chance you will never see it again and a 40-percent chance you will double your money.

Common logic would say not to take that bet, but that's because this gambling experience has been stripped down to its purest sense. There are no flashing lights, no flashy dress and no bells or buzzers.

Anyone will tell you the single biggest perk of Las Vegas is the free drinks. It is nice that whenever you are gambling a waitress can bring just about any kind of drink you imagine. It's a great thing for the gambling soul. Everyone told me that was the best thing when comparing Las Vegas to the Kansas City, Mo., riverboats.

It was nice, but it just helped drive my point home.

I'm sitting in a hundred-acre, ritzy casino with thousands of hotel rooms, dozens of bars and night clubs that offer everything under the sun. It's a paradise for the common man who is living what seems to be the high life. It is, by all appearances, my first taste of the good life because I have waitresses coming from all directions waiting to serve me with the finest in alcoholic liquors.

It's no wonder they will throw any kind of any liquor at large amounts at you, because to them, a $25 bottle of booze is nothing. To me, it's a prized possession.

Remember the saying that there's no such thing as a free lunch? Well, there's no such thing as a free drink in Las Vegas. Look hard enough and you will see just how much you are paying for that double gin and tonic.

Only fools would think they could beat this monstrosity.

You can't win because the more you look around, the more you realize that this stuff all around you doesn't come from nowhere. These hotels, which are sprouting up left and right, take millions of dollars to build and run. They don't keep running and growing because they benefit from some sort of ill-fated charity that gives back to the everyday person for the years of suffering and heartache.

They prosper because they have created a system in which they cannot lose. They have created a fail-proof business.

And everyone's the victim. Heck, I fell victim because none of this really occurred to me until the airplane ride home. I was too overwhelmed by the whole Las Vegas experience to realize the incredible injustice being done to me and every fool like me.

But you live and learn, and lucky for me, I learned at age 22.

I do hope to go back to Las Vegas sometime. It's a great town with lots of things to do. It's a town that shuts down, well, never. This time I will go to the same night clubs, the same bars and the same restaurants but will not fall victim to the temptations around me.

This time I will take my money out of my pocket only to buy a drink, and never give it to my worst enemy.

I will never again give them that satisfaction.

Environment yields to street construction

There is often debate about the government's responsibilities towards its citizens and the responsibility it holds to the environment. Sometimes these responsibilities are in conflict.

In the past school year, construction around Anderson Avenue has escalated. One effect of this construction was the removal of several trees along the intersection of Anderson and Denison avenues.

The government is responsible for the safety, security and normalcy of its citizens' public lives. A government ensures order.

So far as the Anderson trees are concerned, these antiquated squirrel-homes were in the way for extra lanes on Anderson.

In this instance, the government decided the value of the new lanes outweighed the old trees. The foliage had to be removed in order for the government to do its job and help promote the common welfare.

The history of that intersection includes several accidents, enough that it prompted the city of Manhattan to take notice and investigate. Much like a parent protecting its child, so did the government take measures to ensure our safety.

Without considering the future of the people, a government cannot ensure a future for them. The trees are not vital to the future of Manhattan or K-State, while the extra two lanes are.

If the government chose not to remove the trees along Anderson, and therefore chose not to improve the intersection, the government would be compromising the future safety of its populace for the preservation of trees.

This is not the purpose of government. When it comes to making a decision, a government cannot act righteously without following this rule of the people, and for Manhattan, this means deciding in favor of traffic-condition maintenance instead of environment maintenance.

Underlying this decision is the fact that progress and further development are rooted in wins and losses. One cannot make a decision without gaining some things and losing others. This is a basic fact of existence.

It is perhaps unfortunate, but one cannot have everything. The reason for this is that we live in a world of infinite demands and limited resources. A decision, therefore, implies this fact, and it separates what should be gained and from what should be lost.

In this case, the trees along Anderson are the losses. The gains are increased road safety and the quicker and more efficient and appropriate commuting times. The fact is, that by taking out the trees — which can be replanted — Manhattan is slowly adjusting to the increased population and therefore traffic. There is literally not enough room in this city for the both of them.

This brings up another fundamental concept: while trees can be replanted, lives lost from improper traffic engineering can not be brought back. The government has a responsibility, and ultimately it lies with the sovereign individual.

VIEWPOINT

This is an example of the principles to which all things bow. The result of a specific decision most definitely will have certain consequences. One can learn what consequences go with which decisions through one's past experiences.

The fact that every decision carries consequences — and that one can learn from them — is a great responsibility. It permeates all actions in this universe, and governments must realize that they, too, hold such responsibility.

Success or failure depends on whether mistakes are learned from. By using past experiences to predict the future, life naturally will tend towards improvement, progress and positive growth.

The decision to remove the trees in order to increase the safety of the community follows this maxim. The past has shown that the intersection is unsafe. Our government, because it must be responsible for their actions, must decide to favor the safety of the community over the environment, especially when the environment is a replantable thing, such as the trees that were along Anderson. While we might pity the trees now, our grandchildren undoubtedly will be grateful that we improved the intersection and secured a part of their future.

Programming debate hints at racism

Editor,

I am responding to Danedri Thompson's editorial in the Feb. 8 issue of the Collegian and its rather naive assessment of the decision to rearrange some of KSDB-FM 91.9's programming. If we left decisions like this up to ingenuous thinkers like her, then lily-white K-State will remain an administratively sanctioned, racist plantation-state.

"Hold on!" you say. She's not a racist, and our proud campus is not a plantation-state. How dare I make such allegations? OK then, give me a few minutes to explain. Most of us are unwilling to admit we (white, middle-class Americans) are over-privileged, but at the same time most of us will admit that minorities are disadvantaged. As a privileged, dominant class within our society, whites (like myself) are taught to avoid noticing our position of privilege. Hey, wake up! If someone is at a disadvantage, someone else has an advantage. We grow up believing that racism only takes the form of overt acts of malicious intent — when in fact, racism takes on many forms, some overt, while most are far more subtle.

Thompson's argument falls apart immediately after one realizes that all the groups she mentioned, i.e., the theater majors, etc., choose to be members of that group. People of color cannot make this choice and statements like hers only continue to foster an "us against them" mentality. One does not declare one's race or pledge to be in a minority.

The silence and inactivity of our own university president, coupled with the language of our media and the arbitrary movement of radio programming are all forms of subtle (or not so subtle) racism here. Individual attitudes alone do not end racism. Ending policies and social hierarchies that continue to grant dominance of one group over another is the only way to bring an end to these problems.

Thompson's argument continues to fall apart with her not so cleverly disguised claim of reverse discrimination, and her claim that Todd Simon and the Black Student Union should save their complaints for what she calls "real" discrimination — what, like an actual lynching? Being told to go to the back of the bus is hardly silly or frivolous. The BSU decision to ask for a reversal of an arbitrary and subtly (maybe overt?) racist decision is worthy of praise, not mockery.

Sit down Danedri Thompson, you're out of line.

Minors may face steep penalties for drinking

By JOEY ECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LAWRENCE — Students residing in Douglas County soon might face steeper penalties for the use of fake IDs and underage drinking.

The Joint City-Universities Task Force on Alcohol Abuse Prevention recently submitted recommendations to city officials that, if implemented, would help to curb the existing problems the task force sees.

Jeff Weinberg, assistant to the Chancellor at the University of Kansas, said underage drinking was perceived to be a problem that affected the entire community, not just the college.

Weinberg said the death of several KU students in the past couple of years from alcohol-related accidents, along with the number of convictions for minor in possession of alcohol in the community, was part of the rationale behind the task force.

The committee, which was formed in 1998, is made up of members of the entire Lawrence community including students, faculty and staff from both the University of Kansas and Haskell Indian Nations University, Lawrence High School students, Lawrence mayor Marty Kennedy, representatives from the Lawrence Tavern Owners Association, the assistant district attorney, and KU and Lawrence police chiefs.

Some of the recommendations from the task force include a fine of $300 for a first conviction of an MIP. Subsequent convictions would result in a $500 fine. The task force also submitted the recommendation to publicize a guaranteed $500 reward for those providing information that leads to the arrest and conviction of anyone caught selling fake IDs.

This suggestion included increased enforcement and penalties for knowingly using fake IDs.

The committee urged for this program to be adopted by the state legislature and made a statewide regulation.

Weinberg said he is confident city officials will approve all the recommendations by the task force.

"All the recommendations have been accepted, and it is my idea that most, if not all, will be adopted," Weinberg said.

Weinberg said he feels the program is fairly original because it is a community-wide effort.

"KU students are not isolated on the top of the hill," he said. "They are a part of this whole community."

The program, started in the Lawrence area, is beginning to spark similar changes in other communities.

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services at K-State, said prevention always has been a community-wide effort.

"The Alcohol and Drug Education Service office has recently applied for a significant grant to help the prevention efforts on campus," Arck said.

Because the office is waiting for finalization of the contract, Arck was unable to comment further on the grant.

"All I can say is look forward to something happening within the next 10 days to augment the total prevention efforts on campus," Arck said.

Plan could hurt hospitals

By LIBBY QUAID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The new White House budget proposal to slash Medicare payments will hurt rural hospitals, Kansas lawmakers said.

Sen. Pat Roberts and Rep. Jerry Moran are urging colleagues to reject President Clinton's plan to curb payments to hospitals from the health-insurance program for the elderly and disabled further. Congressional resistance to the proposed cuts is expected to grow.

At the same time, Clinton said he wants to use 15 percent of government surpluses projected over 15 years to prop up Medicare, which now is expected to run short of money in 2008. Estimates show Medicare's annual costs will balloon by about $60 billion in the next five years.

"Given the pressures already facing hospitals in rural states like Kansas, these cuts are extremely difficult for many of these hospitals to absorb," according to a letter sent Monday by Roberts to Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

Clinton's budget proposal freezes reimbursements to hospitals for in-patient services, which Roberts said would cost Kansas hospitals $6.75 million in the first year. The state's hospitals would suffer another $500,000 annually from reduced payments for indigent care.

Congress in 1997 shaved Medicare payments by billions of dollars, prompting protests from health care providers who said they are stretched too thin.

The two Kansas Republicans are advocating a long-term Medicare overhaul that will protect hospitals in rural America. Many are middle-sized hospitals that were too large to avoid slashed reimbursements in 1997 but too small to attract private-sector competition and the choices it brings.

"Rather than another round of hastily crafted cuts, we need a long-term plan to ensure the solvency of this critical program and to insure that rural health-care providers and patients are treated fairly," Moran said Tuesday in a speech on the House floor.

Judge ends American Airlines pilots' protest

American Airlines pilots forced to end sickout that ground airline to a halt.

By KATIE FAIRBANK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DALLAS — A federal judge Wednesday ordered American Airlines pilots to end a sickout that grounded 2,500 flights, stranded 200,000 travelers and left businesses scrambling for cargo carriers.

U.S. District Judge Joe Kendall chided the pilots union and the airline into issuing a temporary restraining order, and told them to resume negotiating.

"It's silly for us to even be here," said Kendall, who ordered the pilots to return to work Thursday.

"It's like killing a gnat with a sledgehammer."

Kendall warned pilots they could be held in contempt of court if they do not return to work.

He also placed some blame for the dispute on the airline.

"If you would look up bad labor relations in the dictionary, you would have an American Airlines logo beside it," Kendall said.

Allied Pilots Association president Rich LaVoy said after the hearing that the union "will be encouraging our pilots to get back in the cockpits."

Whether that will happen remains to be seen.

During a previous pilot sickout against the airline in 1990, many failed to return despite a court order.

AMR Corp., the airline's parent company, had asked the judge to order pilots to stop calling in sick amid a labor dispute about salaries paid to pilots of Reno Air, which it acquired recently.

"They're threatening to bring the airline to a complete halt," AMR attorney Dee Kelly said.

The job action started Saturday after talks stalled over the issue of when pilots from Reno Air would be upgraded to the pay scale received by American's pilots.

American pilots are barred by federal law from striking over the issue but are not obligated to accept overtime shifts, which are not uncommon in day-to-day airline operations.

On Wednesday, when the airline said 2,077 pilots called in sick, passengers struggled through another day of delays as they stared at flashing "Canceled" signs at many main airports.

Nicole Travis, 15, of New York's Long Island, found herself stuck in Chicago as she tried to get to Florida to vacation with her relatives.

"It was supposed to be an eight-day vacation, but now it's only seven days. This day was wasted," she said.

Jim Valentine and Kelly Young of Green Bay, Wis., found themselves stuck at Miami International Airport, worried they would miss their wedding in St. Lucia.

"There's a three-day residency requirement in St. Lucia to get married," Valentine, 37, said. "If we don't get there today, our residency requirement won't be met."

Young, 33, added: "Oh my God, I have a very sick feeling in my stomach. I'm just shaking. It's not exactly what I imagined for my wedding week. I have my bridal gown in my wardrobe bag ... and it's probably all wrinkled."

The loss of American's cargo services caused trouble at Gladstone's 4 Fish restaurant in Malibu, Calif., where supplies of Alaskan dungeness crab were dwindling.

"All of our food is fresh," spokeswoman Christine Lloyd said.

"We rely heavily on things coming in every day."

TWA, Delta and other airlines accepted American tickets in the same price class and waived the customary change-of-flight fee, as part of a pact between airlines.

Airline analyst Raymond Neidl of Furman Selz Inc. estimated American is losing about $19 million a day in revenue.

American's 9,400 pilots said AMR should add Reno Air pilots to its roster more quickly, thereby moving all employees up on its pay scale.

AMR said it will take about 12 to 18 months to move pilots into their new positions and that the union's demand for pay raises would cost as much as $50 million this year.

Rebounding, practice lead Aggies to win

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — The Texas A&M Aggies say they're turning their basketball program around in practice.

Shanne Jones scored 18 points and Clifton Cook added 17 Wednesday night, leading Texas A&M in a 79-74 victory over K-State.

Chris Clayton and Texas A&M coach Melvin Watkins said the victory was won in workouts.

"The last couple of weeks, our practices have been just like games," Clayton said. "We go hard, we practice like we don't know each other. Lately, the winning has helped us play looser."

Added Watkins: "This win is a byproduct of what's been happening in practice."

The Aggies, 11-10 overall and 4-7 in the Big 12, never trailed after a 14-0 first-half run that turned a 13-7 deficit into a 21-13 lead with 10:20 to go before halftime.

Cook and Clayton each hit three-pointers in the run, and Aaron Jack had four points.

Texas A&M led 38-31 at halftime and by 58-45 after the first of consecutive three-pointers by Clayton with 10:54 left.

"The key was that we couldn't hit the open jumper in the first half," said K-State coach Tom Asbury. "We took too many threes, but that was probably part of their game plan. The other thing that hurt us was their tremendous offensive rebounding."

The Wildcats, 15-9 overall and 4-7 in the Big 12, threatened a comeback in the closing minutes. With the Aggies ahead 74-65 with 1:24 left, Cortez Groves came off the bench and hit a trio of three-pointers to make it 77-74 with 8.5 seconds to go.

But Texas A&M held on by hitting nine of its last 10 free throws.

Clayton finished with 11 points for the Aggies.

K-State was led by Groves and Tony Kitt with 17 points apiece. Ayome May added 10.

Chiefs announce new defensive coordinator

By DOUG TUCKER

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — There'll still be a Schottenheimer coaching the Kansas City Chiefs after all.

Kurt Schottenheimer was named defensive coordinator Wednesday by Gunther Cunningham, who became head coach last month after Marty Schottenheimer resigned.

Kurt, 49, broke into the NFL on Marty's staff in Cleveland in 1987 and then accompanied his older brother to Kansas City in 1989 when Marty became head coach of the Chiefs. He was the Chiefs' special teams coach for six years and spent the past four years coaching defensive backs.

Cunningham said that when he was hired as defensive coordinator four years ago, he and Kurt Schottenheimer became instant friends.

"Kurt and I met, and Marty said, 'My God, you guys get along,'" Cunningham said.

"Bang! The relationship developed, and from that time on he made all the adjustments for me on the sideline. He is a very strong, strong person. It goes back to his special teams background. The combination of those things made me see the light. I went through 85 different scenarios. This job wasn't promised to him. It was my decision."

The new Chiefs' staff will look a lot like the old one.

Besides promoting Schottenheimer to defensive coordinator, Cunningham is retaining Mike Solari as offensive line coach and Jimmy Raye as offensive coordinator. In addition, Bob Karmelovitch and Darvon Wallis have been retained as defensive line coach and defensive assistant.

Cunningham has hired former Chiefs' defensive coordinator Dave Adolph as assistant head coach/linebackers coach. In addition, Ron Zook was hired off the Pittsburgh staff to coach defensive backs. Earlier, the Chiefs said they had named Keith Rowen as tight ends coach and Richard Mann to replace Al Saunders as wide receivers coach.

Still to be named is a quarterback coach. Cunningham has been talking with Tom Rossley, who was an assistant last year with the Chicago Bears.

Wildcats drop highly touted Iowa State

By NICK BRATKOVIC

Despite playing without junior forward Angie Finkes, the K-State women's basketball team overcame a seven-point deficit in the second half to knock off No. 15 Iowa State 70-63 Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State's forwards stepped up in Finkes' absence as the Cats went on a 21-4 run with 10:56 left to play after trailing throughout the game.

With the victory, the Wildcats move to 13-8 on the season and 6-5 in the Big 12 conference, while the Cyclones, which were tied for first place in the Big 12 before tonight's contest, move to 16-5 overall and 8-3 in the conference.

In order to close out the victory, sophomore guard Kim Woodlee hit three three-pointers during the Wildcat run.

"I was able to get some good looks and hit some open shots," Woodlee said.

K-State coach Deb Patterson said the second-half run was a result of her team's second-half defense.

"I felt like we did a nice job of playing on-the-ball defense," Patterson said. "They just dug in and were determined to play defense."

The Cats held Iowa State to just 39 percent from the field, and out-rebounded the Cyclones 44 to 37.

K-State was able to win the rebounding battle despite the loss of Finkes, who will be out a minimum of two weeks due to a leg injury.

Because of Finkes' inside play, Patterson said the team desperately needs her back as soon as possible.

"I want our leading rebounder, our second-leading scorer and our best defender on the floor," Patterson said. "And that is Angie Finkes."

With Finkes out, sophomore forward Brandy Harris stepped up by scoring a career-high 21 points and grabbing nine rebounds.

"I couldn't have expected her to have that type of performance," Patterson said. "On this particular night Brandy stepped up and filled some big shoes."

After the game, Harris said she was pleased with the performance.

"I feel great. I think it is the best I have ever played and the hardest I've ever played," Harris said. "I am very proud of the way that our team played."

In the first half, Iowa State started off the game shooting 57 percent and led 11-4 early.

K-State forward/guard Brandy Harris fights for an offensive rebound with Iowa State guard Megan Taylor during the first half of Wednesday night's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats out-rebounded the Cyclones 43 to 38.

Midway through the first half the Cats couldn't seem to buy a basket as a Harris jumper went in and out.

It was a half in which K-State received little or no production from the outside, as 22 of the team's 28 first-half points came from Harris and center Olga Firsova. The Cats held the lead just once and Iowa State led at halftime 33-28. K-State shot just 39 percent from the field.

The Cats looked to get forward Nicky Ramage involved as she opened the second half with back-to-back layups. Patterson said the layups were a result of an offensive change the team made at halftime.

"In the second half, we made some offensive changes and were able to get some good looks," Patterson said. "We had some success with passes to the post."

The Cats trailed by seven before the second-half run, but Woodlee said the team seemed focused on a victory.

"It kind of reminded me of the Colorado game. We were down in that game with five minutes to play, and we were not scared," Woodlee said. "We know we can do it and we know we can come back. We had won that game and we knew we could win this one."

Patterson said it is encouraging to see her team play and defeat a ranked opponent.

"It's exciting to think about our ability to compete on that level, and to see the standard that we are capable of playing," Patterson said. "It is nice to know that this is what we were capable of."

Harris helps lead Wildcats to victory

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

What happens when you face the top team in the Big 12, a team that leads the conference in rebounding, without your leading rebounder?

Well, if you're K-State coach Deb Patterson, you put forward Brandy Harris in the post and watch her fight the Iowa State Cyclones.

Despite losing leading rebounder and second-leading scorer Angie Finkes to an injury, the Cats managed to grab 43 rebounds compared to Iowa State's 38. Harris led the team with nine, including eight defensive rebounds.

With K-State winning the battle of the boards against Iowa State, sophomore guard Kim Woodlee said that this aspect of the game was pivotal in the Wildcats' victory.

"Towards the end of the game, if we hadn't gotten those boards, hadn't been grabbing the ball and fighting for it, we wouldn't have pulled away," Woodlee said. "As we did that it slowed them down and helped our momentum."

The team gathered 31 defensive rebounds over the course of the game which prevented Iowa State from scoring.

Cyclone freshman center Angie Welle said every defensive rebound set the Cyclones back.

"We weren't getting the rebounds. We couldn't get second opportunities to score without getting the rebounds," Welle said. "Their post players stepped up and played really physical, and we just didn't handle it."

Patterson said before the game she was somewhat concerned about the inside game against the Cyclones, who had a height advantage over the Wildcats, but that she was very pleased with the performance.

HARRIS

"That's probably the thing I was most excited about, to see Ramage and Harris so active on the boards," Patterson said. "We were quick to the ball, we were determined to get the ball, and we went up strong with both hands."

"I think our post players rebounded with passion and intensity tonight. Harris got some critical rebounds that got us some second and third shots," she said.

Harris, who hadn't played the post position since high school, said she was just trying to adapt well to a new position. At 5 feet 11 inches, Harris had to overcome Iowa State's height advantage.

"Everyone on the court and the bench wanted it," Harris said. "We played defense and got some stops and we rebounded tremendously tonight. When you're determined it doesn't matter how tall you are."

VIEWPOINT

VIETTI

We have reached the time on the sports calendar when there is nothing to talk about. No more football. Baseball is on the horizon, but spring training doesn't really kick into gear for a few more weeks.

I suppose one could count the new roller derby fiasco that is on TNN about 30 times a week, but for some reason, I just don't see the new league as making it to the same level as that Arena Football League.

With that in mind, I move to an issue that has long been controversial in the minds of not only sports enthusiasts, but normal people as well. I know what you're thinking — hell will freeze over before ol' Vietti writes anything in his column that could be considered serious.

Well, I have to admit, that is true. However, I still have this precious space to voice my opinion on the most widely read magazine in the world: "Sports Illustrated Swimsuit issue."

I can remember a time when I was in junior high, when every year my mom would intercept my swimsuit edition and quickly toss it in the trash before I knew what was going on. Perhaps it is all those years of being disgusted at my mom, but I honestly think SI should consider giving the edition the boot.

Yeah! Hooray for feminism!

I don't think so. Please understand that I think SI and all of the other sports magazines who depict women in scantily clad garments should get rid of their unnecessary editions, but for a completely different reason: What's the point of having them?

Follow me here. I go into a store around swimsuit issue time. I stroll over to the magazine section and proceed to pick up a magazine with a picture of a nearly naked woman revealing her bosom to me. I won't lie, that's a pretty sight.

But when granny comes walking down the aisle looking to pick up the newest "Reader's Digest" and she sees me gazing into the eyes of a beautiful woman on the cover of a magazine who has just enough clothing on not to get arrested for exposing herself in public—what does granny think? "Oh, that lovely little boy is reading a sports magazine."

Umm... I don't think so. "I can't believe that child! Looking at pornography—what is wrong with his parents? Do they know he's committing a mortal sin? I'm going to say an extra prayer tonight for all of the young people in the world who look at such things."

I think that is probably the more plausible reaction, and that is the point of my ramblings. If I go to the store and pick up a 100 percent porno magazine, I will get the exact same reaction from granny: She'll have to plead with God to save the planet from Satan.

I'm a firm believer in doing something full blown, or not doing it at all. Why go out and purchase a magazine where you can't see everything you want to see when right next to it is a publication that would do the trick much better?

Do men or women out in the world who look at swimsuit magazines really think they are better than some poor shmoe who's peering at a true porno?

Do they think that if they walk up to a cashier with a swimsuit magazine as opposed to a porno, the cashier will think of them as a highly respectable person or even think of them differently?

I say if they do, they're completely fooling themselves. It is really all the same. People look at both types of magazines with the same intentions to see a good looking person.

Somebody doesn't look at a swimsuit edition and say, "I bet Kate Moss spends hours per day reading books and applying herself towards getting a master's degree. I bet she spends a lot of time with her family and has a great personality."

People look at swimsuit magazines and say, "Damn! That Kate Moss is hot!" It is the exact same scenario with pornos—people look at them to see the beautiful bodies of individuals who are much better looking than anybody they will ever have the good fortune of entering any kind of relationship with.

Point blank—it truly is that simple. Now I'm no fool (in this situation only). I realize these pornos, I mean swimsuit magazines, will stay on the market forever.

But next time a friend of yours is staring at Cindy Crawford or some other famous model in a swimsuit, make sure and tell them that they aren't any better than the guy next door who spends hours every night fantasizing about all of the "women with great personalities" he can see on the World Wide Web who just happen to be wearing a little bit less than a skimpy swimsuit.

THE GONGFARMERS BY RANDY REGIER

Amy Verdon (right), senior in theater playing the part of Katherine Brynne, and Donna Davenport, senior in theater playing the part of Margaret Civil, perform during a dress rehearsal of "A Perfect Ganesha" Tuesday night at Nichols Theatre. The play is at 8 tonight through Saturday night and Feb. 17-20.

Searching through India

A tale of spiritual healing and self-actualization finds its way to Nichols stage

Story by Diana Lee ■ Photo by Steven Dearing

Two middle-aged women who think they know everything about one another are about to find out there's more than meets the eye.

In "A Perfect Ganesha," the first KSU Theatre production of the spring semester, the two main characters travel to India in an attempt to find healing, only to discover it was within them all along. "A Perfect Ganesha" is by playwright Terrence McNally.

Kate Anderson, director of the play and associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance, said the two women, Margaret Civil (Donna Davenport, senior in theater) and Katherine Brynne (Amy Verdon, senior in theater) both have experienced a great deal of pain in their lives and are hoping they can relieve themselves of it by making their journey to India.

"They have both been plagued by pain and guilt and sadness in their lives and they are hoping their trip can lead to healing and growth," Anderson said. "On a conceptual level, the play says that at this point in the world, fear and mistrust keep us separated from each other. They learn they must forgive themselves before they can reach out to each other."

Another main character, Ganesha (Diana Yamabayashi), is a Hindu god, but also portrays other characters in the play. Anderson said Ganesha symbolizes something she believes everyone can relate to.

"Ganesha is one of the Hindu gods, the one with the elephant's head, who plays other characters too," Anderson said. "On a conceptual level, McNally is saying that god is in everyone. They keep seeing people they haven't worked issues out with yet in Ganesha. This helps Margaret and Katherine face up to things they have avoided dealing with."

Anderson said part of the reason she was interested in producing "A Perfect Ganesha" was the significant ideas that it explores.

"It's about a lot of issues that are important and it's also very theatrical," she said. "I like the fact that it's not really about India but it takes place there to explore spiritual ideas, since India is typically a healing place and the characters are confronted by things they're afraid of there. It's full of serious issues handled in a funny way."

Anderson said no props will be used within the play. Instead, two actors will make sound effects, directed by Morgan Brown, freshman in theater, that create the illusion of props off stage.

"It has been a great miming challenge for Morgan to coordinate all of the sounds to the actor's movements," she said. "They've put a lot of work into it, and now they do it so well that they match the actors movements well enough that you forget the props aren't there when you're watching."

Davenport said her biggest challenge has been playing the role of a middle-aged white woman.

"The part I play was originally written for a white woman, and being a person of color, that presented me with a big challenge as to deciding how to deal with that," she said. "There are a number of race themes and class themes throughout the play that I had to deal with when preparing for my character."

Davenport also said she didn't want to ignore the race issue.

"I've recently been to some workshops on cultural pluralism in the theater, which helped me solidify the notion of my character," she said. "I knew I definitely wanted to address the issue instead of simply ignoring it."

Students should consider price, reliability when car shopping

By JUSTIN VANNESST
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Manhattan offers many used-car dealerships that can help the student who needs a car but has a tight budget.

While some students can afford a new car, many others cannot. For these students, used-car dealerships offer a variety of options.

There are several things to look for when purchasing a used car, said Robert Caniff, owner of RC Auto Sales.

"I have noticed that there are three things students and all customers in general look for," Caniff said. "They are looking for price, dependability and eye appeal."

Some students, however, have more specific things they look for in a car, Linda McDonnell, salesperson at Car Country, said.

"They look to see if there is a good stereo in the car," McDonnell said. "They don't care if it runs or drives, as long as it sounds good."

Caniff said price and dependability can be important factors when determining what car to purchase.

"Students want a good deal and a good car," Caniff said. "They also want something they will look good in."

Mary Dooley, receptionist for Manhattan Motors Inc., said she agreed.

"Price range is what most students look for," Dooley said. "They generally stick around $5000 to $9000 range."

Caniff said car shoppers in Manhattan tend to have a working knowledge of what to look for in a used car.

"We have very educated customers here in Manhattan," he said. "With the Internet and all the information available out there, people come in knowing exactly what they are looking for."

Dooley said the spring semester usually is the time when business begins to increase for used-car dealerships.

"Various times of the year are much better for business than others. We are really slow in December with the holidays and such," Dooley said. "But around graduation and income-tax-return time, things pick up."

Dooley also said she has found certain cars are large sellers for particular dealerships. Manhattan Motors sells mostly domestic cars.

"Pontiac Grand Ams do well for Manhattan Motors," she said. "It is a slick, nice looking car. It doesn't matter between the two-door or four-door. They both have a nice body style."

McDonnell, meanwhile, said consumers come to Car Country mostly for foreign cars.

"Foreign cars like Hondas and Toyotas do well for us," she said. "Most people have had experience with them before and know what kind of car they are."

KSU Lunchbag Theatre jumpstarts 22nd season

Grab a sandwich and take a seat. Today, KSU Theatre's Lunchbag Theatre begins offering its 22nd season of one-act plays at noon.

Lunchbag Theatre is a class that provides advanced theater students with an opportunity for experience in acting and directing. They perform at 11:30 a.m. on Thursdays throughout the semester in the Purple Masque Theatre.

"This semester, the class will perform 10 plays. Admission is free to all performances."

"This is a vehicle for students to get practical experience in acting and directing in a peer situation," said Lew Shelton, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance. "Since the class work culminates in a public performance, it gives the students more incentive to work hard at what they are doing."

Karl Rutherford, graduate student in theater, said he enjoyed performing in the Lunchbag Series because of the minimal restrictions placed on the performances.

"As an actor, it gives you a chance to stretch yourself and take on roles you wouldn't normally do," he said. "As a director, it gives you a chance to work with different actors and a variety of scripts."

Today marks the first performance, "Next" by playwright Terrence McNally.

Other plays include David Henry Hwang's "The House of Sleeping Beauties" on Feb. 18, Jack Heifner's "Vanities" on March 4,

James Prideaux's "An American Sunset" on March 11 and Martha Boesing's "In the Business at Hand" on March 18. The remainder of the semester's schedule has yet to be announced.

Poetry reading coincides with Valentine's Day

The Union Program Council's Arts Committee will sponsor an open poetry reading at 8 tonight at Java Espresso & Bakery.

Mark Skochdopole, owner of Java, said all poets should restrict their readings to a love theme, in honor of Valentine's Day. However, Skochdopole said the romantic theme is the evening's only restriction on what hopeful readers can share with the audience.

"You can read your own poetry, someone else's poetry, something from a book, song lyrics, anything at all," he said.

During the course of the poetry reading, audience members are encouraged to add to a list of quotes that circles the coffee house. As a special wrap-up to the evening, the list will be read as a free-flowing poem.

Skochdopole said he thought crowd members and Java employees alike always have a good time during poetry nights.

"We have about four a semester, and we've really enjoyed them," Skochdopole said.

"I like providing UPC a space, because it's really added to the atmosphere here."

Potters sculpt life from hobby

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gary Tyson, Manhattan resident, has made 30 to 40 thousand pieces of pottery in his life. His wife, Ronna Tyson, said the number of pots she has made is too many to count.

"I couldn't even tell you," Ronna Tyson said. "I was a single parent working on pots for eight years."

Ronna Tyson worked at home in Canada because she wanted to be home for her children.

"I worked with a kiln in the house because I needed to be home when my kids came home from school, and it worked out pretty well," she said.

Today the Tysons own and operate Wildcat Village Pottery and Studio, located about a quarter mile off of Interstate 70's exit 307 and McDowell Road. Their business is run from a 90-year-old barn, and they spend hours working with glaze, the kiln and learning about pottery.

Gary said he is not as interested in the final product as he is in the process of making pottery.

"If anyone ever tells you that they know everything there is to know about pottery, they are crazy," he said. "Because pottery goes in so many different directions."

Gary said he began taking art classes after getting out of the military and fell in love with pottery the first time he used it as a K-State student. Gary, who has been working with pottery for 11 years, said he learns something from each piece.

"I look at each piece of pottery and decide what worked and didn't work," Gary said. "Then after that, when it's done, I don't care if I ever see it again."

Gary teaches pottery at Washburn University, and his store has recently started offering pottery classes. Classes are offered every Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. Additional classes are also offered on Saturdays. A two-hour class costs $9.

Ronna teaches at Manhattan High School, and said she enjoys watching people learn.

"Many people might not be as expressive verbally, but working with clay allows them to express themselves three-dimensionally," she said.

Gary Tyson, Manhattan resident, does some trim work on a ceramic pot in his Wildcat Village Pottery studio Wednesday afternoon. The studio, which Tyson and his wife Ronna own, is located at 329 Lower McDowell Creek Road. The studio is open from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m., Tuesday through Saturday.

Bronwyn Rounds, Tyson's step-daughter and senior in art therapy and psychology, said her parents' love for pottery has had a positive effect on her.

"The enthusiasm they have is inspiring to me as an artist," Rounds said.

The Tysons' enthusiasm for their business caused them to buy the barn, built in 1909 to house work horses. After buying the land two years ago, they moved their business from Keats, Kan. to its present home.

"We wanted to get away from town and have some elbow room," Ronna said. "It gave us room to do some expansions and outside activity that if we lived in town, we wouldn't be able to do."

Today, Gary said he and his wife work to preserve the barn's heritage.

"We wanted to keep the barn intact, and keep its character," Gary said.

Inside of Wildcat Village Pottery there are remnants of where horses once lived and hay used to be stored. The heritage of the barn mixed in with the pottery give the store a distinctive atmosphere.

Gary said one of the only changes to the barn was to enclose and heat one section of the barn.

Rounds said the way her parents have maintained the barn has been incredible.

"You probably never saw the barn when they first got it," Rounds said. "Before it was dirty and looked like a normal barn, but they have done an amazing job with it."

Gary said he has always appreciated seeing old buildings maintained and used for different tasks.

He said the idea of turning the barn into a work area and store stemmed from traveling in the South and seeing old cotton warehouses in Georgia converted into specialty shops.

When the Tysons were looking to relocate, he said they found the barn and knew it was the place.

"We began looking for a place a couple of years ago," Gary said. "We saw this place and immediately fell in love with it."

Today the barn is filled with pottery, both finished and still molding.

He said the store has several projects in the works and plans to offer customers more services in the future, such as a possible wood-kiln weekend tutorial next year.

"We would like to have other potters come in and do workshops," Gary said.

the charges "have not been proved" at the historic month-long trial now drawing to a close. He said he wished Clinton, who refused to be questioned in writing or in person, had submitted to a "firm examination" by lawyers in the case.

Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., said Tuesday night he will vote for Clinton's conviction on the charge of obstruction of justice but not on perjury.

"I cannot will to my children and grandchildren the proposition that a president stands above the law and can systematically obstruct justice because both his polls and the Dow Jones index are high," Gorton said.

With Clinton's acquittal assured, Democrats continued their campaign for a formal vote to censure the president after the trial.

But Republican opposition seemed to be stiffening, and Specter said censure would violate the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers.

"There's been very little mention of censure" in the closed-door deliberations, Sen. Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said. "To me, the push for censure is losing steam."

Democratic leader Tom Daschle said he is hoping for at least a procedural vote before lawmakers adjourn for a weeklong vacation, a roll call that would allow Democrats to go on record condemning the president's behavior while acquitting him at his trial.

With Chief Justice William Rehnquist presiding, the Senate spent a second day behind closed doors, senators taking turns delivering their final statements. By day's end, an estimated 55 senators had spoken, and prospects for a final vote today were dimming.

Inside the shuttered Senate chamber, Republicans and Democrats took turns laying out their reasoning on the case. "I think people were reaching for history, given the occasion," Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer said.

LOVE LETTERS

Or Theodore Roosevelt's missives to Alice: "Oh, my sweetest true love, pray for nothing but that I may be worthy of you?"

Urdang, also a poet, said she hopes so.

Love letters, handwritten and signed pledges of passion, can infuse existing relationships with romance and excitement.

"And if you're trying to woo someone, there's nothing as delightful as getting a love letter," she said.

Provided it's not 12 tiny-print pages.

There are other don'ts, Urdang told her students, one of them a musician hoping to learn to write better ballads. She reads from Aldous Huxley's "Point Counter Point," in which Everard Webley writes to Elinor of his unrequited love:

"I warn you: one of these days I'll try the good old methods. I'll do a slight Rape of the Sabines and then where will your ineffable, remote superiority be? How I hate you really for compelling me to love you so much! ... And you not here to receive the punishment you deserve!"

Not a sterling example, Urdang said, "but it's too fetching in its badness not to mention."

(And one student observes: "Write that today and you'd be charged with harassment.")

Better, Urdang says, is to sound a little vulnerable. Let your intended know you're open to being rejected. But not too vulnerable.

"There's nothing more unappealing than someone approaching you in a sniveling way," she said.

Other "dos" from Urdang:

■ Tune into your feelings. Are you missing her? Craving him? Thinking about the future together? "If you take the time to examine what you really feel about the person, you'll probably have the words," she said.

■ Use humor. "Someone who makes you laugh is someone whose company you want."

■ Be accurate. "If they have blue eyes and you sing the praises of their brown eyes, you're not going to get the points."

■ Show you were listening by mentioning a favorite movie or song.

■ Write, don't type, especially when signing your name.

Other don'ts:

■ Don't rush.

■ Don't overdo it. "If it sounds like too much to you, it probably is."

■ Don't use disclaimers like "You probably don't know me but" You don't want to start out dissing yourself.

"Who's going to be attracted to someone who's insecure?"

"It is really an incredible dance to achieve all of this together," Urdang said, and offered this final tip:

"People who think you can overuse the word 'love,' are crazy. You can never overuse positive words."

than that," she said.

Coffee shops, bookstores, clothing stores, professional businesses, eating establishments and more also make Aggieville what it is, she said.

"We promise that it's an okay place to bring your family," Sieben said. "We cater to such a diverse group. That goes back to what makes us unique."

The Aggieville Business Association is doing its part to fight the stereotype by providing pregame activities during football season.

Walter said the association has used the football phenomenon to bring family entertainment to Aggieville.

Touchdown Weekend is one family-oriented activity that has become a tradition. It includes a pep rally, games, free stuff and music.

"Nebraska game day, Aggieville was the center of the world," Walter said.

The Memories

Although the Aggieville Business Association is trying to move away from the stereotype of a place to drink, for some, memories of Aggieville will always include alcohol.

Larry Parker, K-State alumnus, described Aggieville as a "3.2 bar haven" because at the time he frequented it, the drinking age was 18.

He said he came from a little town in Illinois where the drinking age was 21, so Aggieville was a big deal to him.

"When you weren't in class you were in Aggieville," said Pat Parker, Larry's wife and K-State alumna. "Everybody went to Aggieville. Even if you didn't drink, Aggieville was the only place to go."

It was hard to even drive through Aggieville because everyone walked across the street in a big mass, Pat said.

"Probably like it is now after a KU-K-State game," she said.

Aggieville was really geared toward drinking, Larry said.

"You couldn't eat a meal — all they had was beer, sometimes popcorn or pretzels," Pat said.

Pat remembered the first week she was at K-State and the active members of the sorority she had pledged took her and the other pledges out to Aggieville.

"I was so nervous because I just knew someone was going to come through and card me and send me home before classes even started," she said.

One of the bars that sticks out in Larry's mind was called "The John."

"All the seats in it were toilet seats," he said.

The kegs of beer were in urinals.

"So they would stick your beer mug in a urinal and fill it," Larry said.

The big thing to do back then was steal pitchers, Larry said.

"If you didn't steal a pitcher, you weren't anything," he said. "Everybody had a pitcher full of pennies."

Larry and Pat were going to K-State and visiting Aggieville during the Vietnam War, which caused constant confrontation between the soldiers coming to Aggieville and students, they said.

"They weren't particularly welcome there, but they came," Larry said.

Pat said the students forgot the soldiers were their age and far from home, and they just wanted to be around people their own age.

"But we treated them differently because of their uniforms," she said.

There was a period of time when many of the G.I.s would drag race against the college students, Larry said. They would start where Streetside Records is now and race to City Park.

This continued until one night a G.I. threw a military tear gas canister in to the crowd.

"It was like a riot," he said.

After that night, drag races in Aggieville were nonexistent.

Now as Larry and Pat look back on Aggieville, they've noticed many changes besides the change of the drinking age.

Authorities are really cracking down on the drinking laws, Larry said. If students walked out of a bar with a beer in their hands in the 1970s, police would make them pour it out and send them on their way, he said. Now, they get busted.

Everyone also behaved themselves, Larry said.

"I don't remember one single fight in my four years in Aggieville, not one," he said. "Now there are stabbings."

Dancing the night away

Finding a place to dance on a Friday or Saturday night might prove difficult. A few bars provide a small dance floor to let loose to the latest hits, but much of the time is spent fighting for space.

In the past, finding a place to dance was not a problem.

"Aggieville was a place to come and dance," Dan Walter said.

"The concept of guys and girls going to a bar and having a drink and dancing is passed," Walter said.

Beginning with the 1920s, dancing was a big thing in Aggieville. From then until the 1960s, dancing was a socially acceptable event, Walter said.

There was everything from big band dancing to formal for dorms, sororities, fraternities and campus clubs. The dances had a different atmosphere than the dances now. According to The Harrison Building Scrapbook:1915-1998, written by Walter, a dance held by Beta Theta Pi fraternity had five-piece orchestra and professors who were chaperones.

There were sock hops that only cost a quarter to attend.

The Avalon Ballroom was specific to dancing, Walter said, but now there isn't really a place like that.

In the 1960s there were dances in the streets, but Walter said the dances became so successful that they had to quit — so many people made it unruly.

Part of K-State tradition

Although a separate entity from K-State, Aggieville is frequently connected with K-State in the minds of many students, potential students and parents.

Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said Aggieville is definitely a part of the K-State tradition.

"Aggieville plays a double-edged sword to our university image," he said.

It becomes part of a longstanding tradition for undergraduates, but for many, it reflects youthful entertainment in sometimes not the most positive way, Bosco said.

"There are times that Aggieville and drinking become synonymous," he said.

Despite this, K-State still includes Aggieville in its recruitment programs.

"We include Aggieville in our presentations to prospective students and families," Bosco said.

"It's a great tradition that certainly helps in attracting K-State students to the university," he said.

After the presentations, Bosco said the students and families are seen in Aggieville.

"Like it or not, a complete trip to Manhattan and to K-State typically includes a trip to Aggieville," he said. "I think K-State and Aggieville are synonymous in the hearts and minds of many."

legal issues," Huser said.

Fellows wouldn't comment on what he would do if the appeals failed.

"We'll just have to see what happens," Fellows said. "This is my livelihood, so I hope it all works out."

Although the 15 MIPs were issued to individuals at KJ's, Huser said the bar itself was never prosecuted.

"When an individual gets an MIP, the bar is never charged," Huser said. "The bar is not a party, the violation has nothing to do with us. The police reports are forwarded to the ABC, and they notify us."

The penalty structure calls for a stiffer punishment with each MIP, including higher fines and longer license suspensions. On the eighth offense, for example, the owner is fined $1,000, and the license is suspended for 14 consecutive days. Fellows, however, said he was not fined or notified about a suspension until the ABC informed him about the 15 violations.

"They just piled them on," he said. "We don't know how many we have until ABC contacts us."

The majority of the violations occurred during the first week of school, Fellows said. Since then, he said, the bar has cleaned up its act.

Leadership program benefits from sales of Snyder's book in Union

By JESSICA THOMAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Proceeds from Bill Snyder's book, "Leadership Lessons from Bill Snyder," were donated to the K-State Office of Leadership Studies and Programs on Wednesday.

A check for $4,670.38 was presented to Susan Scott, associate dean of student life and leadership studies, by Kay Farley, K-State Union Bookstore manager.

The money came from sales of the book at the Union Bookstore.

Farley said that since the bookstore started selling the book in September of 1998, it has sold 781 copies. She said the bookstore will continue giving the proceeds from the book to the program. Farley said that after co-authors Snyder, Scott and Robert Shoop were paid, everything else was donated to the leadership program.

"When Susan and Bob called me about the book, we knew that this effort would benefit K-State, so we decided to sell the book at regular retail price and donate all the money to the leadership program," Farley said. "At the bookstore, we are excited about the leadership program, and since we have a lot of students working for us, we try to promote leadership in our organization. We are committed to the mission of leadership at K-State and what they are doing with young people."

Scott said she was excited about the donation and that the money would be put to good use.

"We are a new program, so we need the money for everything, from computers to office furniture," she said.

The leadership program, which offers leadership as a minor to K-State students, began in the fall of 1997. There are now more than 400 leadership minors at K-State.

After handing the check to Scott, Farley thanked Snyder for his contributions to helping the leadership program.

"We are so grateful to Coach Snyder for donating his time because he believes in and is so supportive of high school and college leadership programs," she said.

The presentation was part of the 11th annual leadership conference, sponsored by Blue Key Senior Honorary Society, the leadership program and the Division of Continuing Education. Nearly 500 Kansas high school students were in attendance as part of the conference.

Sara Reser, senior in marketing and co-director of the conference, introduced Snyder and read the opening paragraph of his book. She said the idea for the book was born when Snyder spoke to the students who attended the leadership conference last year.

As Snyder took the stage, he was greeted with a standing ovation and whistles from the students. He expressed the need for leaders with solid values and said that by attending the conference, the students were taking a step in the right direction to becoming those leaders.

"I appreciate the reason that you're here," he said. "We need leaders in the future. We don't always set good examples and we don't always have good role models, but I know that you are intelligent people, and that is why you're here."

Snyder said the advice he was dispensing to the students is the same advice he gives to his football players.

He told the students they should surround themselves with people who want to make their lives better. He stressed the importance of making goals and said the three steps that are important in making goals are to analyze what is really important in your life, make up a well-thought-out plan to achieve those goals and finally, "just do it."

After Snyder's speech, many students and their advisers waited for Snyder to sign copies of the book.

David Howard, principal and football coach at Chase High School in Chase, Kan., was among the crowd that sought Snyder's autograph after the speech.

"I think he brought out some very good points," he said. "Especially about goal setting. That is important for kids and is something that I try to stress," he said.

Jason Lacey, senior in mechanical engineering and co-director of the conference, praised Snyder for his leadership abilities.

"First of all, he's done great things with our football program," he said. "He has such vision and strong leadership. He's also very popular right now, so the kids will listen to him and that's important," Lacey said.

Reser said he was a perfect candidate to speak to the high school crowd.

"He relates so well to high school students," she said. "He doesn't just preach, he guides and gives suggestions."

'Sordid saga' to end today

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With acquittal assured, the Senate talked its way through a final full day of closed-door deliberations Thursday at President Clinton's impeachment trial, set for noontime votes Friday in the case that one Democrat called 'this sordid saga.'

Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine became the fourth Republican to declare her intention to vote to acquit on both charges, following the lead of other moderates who broke party ranks a day earlier. Several senators predicted that Susan Collins of Maine would be the fifth, although her office declined comment.

Inside the chamber, where Chief Justice William Rehnquist presided, the talk was blunt at times. "Over and over and over again, from both sides of the aisle," senators denounced the president as a liar, GOP Sen. Bob Bennett of Utah said later.

Bennett predicted that Clinton would go down in history as "the most accomplished polished liar we've ever had in the White House." The name "Clinton," he said, will become part of the lexicon as "a synonym for an elegant, well-crafted lie."

A two-thirds vote is required to convict the president and remove him from office, and there was no chance of that happening. Instead, whatever suspense lingered at the end of the five-week trial was whether either article of impeachment would attain a bare majority — a psychological threshold that had no bearing on Clinton's fate.

Republicans have a 55-45 majority in the Senate. A steady stream of lawmakers came forward

Fraternities go dry to curb costs

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More fraternities are choosing substance-free housing policies, and there is a possibility that stereotypes of alcohol might change.

K-State has four dry fraternities, and several others have plans to switch to substance-free housing within the next few years, Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said.

Robel said many houses nationwide are going dry for liability reasons.

"It's absolutely because of liability," she said. "Going substance-free removes 80 percent of all liability situations. It improves individual safety and reduces property damage and underage drinking."

Of K-State's 24 fraternities, 17 either have taken some step toward substance-free housing or are discussing the possibility, fraternity presidents and risk-management coordinators said.

Three chapter presidents said they had no plans to become substance-free, and four house presidents either were unavailable or unable to comment.

Matt Wildman, Sigma Phi Epsilon president and junior in pre-medicine, said he expected all greek houses to eventually become substance-free.

"I think there's definitely a trend to go dry, either through campus or national fraternity decisions," Wildman said. "I think that all greek houses will be dry in five to 10 years — probably closer to five. I think that's a good thing."

Beta Theta Pi became substance-free in fall 1997. Although the decision was mandated to them because of a hazing violation, the chapter decided to stay dry after their probation ended, President Trevor McKeeman said.

Firefighters battle a fire that destroyed nearly a whole city block in the Aggieville district Feb. 14, 1998. The fire broke out just after 3 a.m., destroyed four businesses and damaged others.

After the Ashes

STORY BY JENNIFER RYAN

Owners reflect on loss a year later

The ashes and debris have been removed, and on the anniversary of the Aggieville fire that destroyed three businesses and damaged several others, the owners who have lost so much are able to look back on the day with appreciation for what they still have.

On the morning of Feb. 14, 1998, a fire began in the 1100 block of Moro Street and destroyed Club Karrington, Adventure Travel and Greek's Pizzeria. Damage was also done to Speedwash Laundry, The Futon Store, On the Wildside, Pizza Hut, Lowman's Men's Store and Game Guy.

"Amazing no one was hurt — that was wonderful," said Joey Gaines, wife of Adam Gaines, the owner of Greek's Pizzeria. "It could have potentially been tragic. Greek's was one and a half years of hard work and life and heart, but it's replaceable."

The night the fire occurred, the couple were in Salina and received a phone call saying the fire would not affect much more than the kitchen wall of the business. But when Adam Gaines returned to Manhattan, Greek's Pizzeria was gone.

"The first month, it was trying to tie up all the loose ends," Joey Gaines said. "The business was his life and it was a huge change. He spent a year trying to find a location, and I'm a senior in vet school so we knew we'd be leaving this year anyway."

There is a possibility of another Greek's Pizzeria, since Adam Gaines still owns the franchise rights in Manhattan. However, the couple plans to move to Omaha, Neb., where Adam Gaines has accepted a job.

Charlie Busch, owner of the property that housed Club Karrington and his wife's business, Adventure Travel, said the fire was tragic.

"We really wanted to stay in Aggieville, but we didn't have the time or money to build again," Busch said.

sons. "My daughter was three at the time, and I wanted to spend more time with my family," she said. "It's a big chunk of time to try to start again."

There is now more competition in Manhattan, she said, because the airline commission system has reduced its commission amount.

K-State to honor Switzer with week-long activities

■ "Veryl Switzer Day" tops list of tributes to alumnus, K-State Hall of Fame athlete

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Veryl Switzer, a longtime K-State administrator and Hall of Fame athlete, will be honored next week by the university for more than 30 years of service.

A person synonymous with K-State, Switzer's decision to retire from duties within the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics this year prompted the decision to celebrate his dedication to service with special events planned during the week of Feb. 15-20. The celebration begins Monday "Veryl Switzer Day" on campus.

After making initial plans for festivities in the fall, Athletics Director Max Urick said the celebration was K-State's way of thanking Switzer for strengthening the community.

"With Veryl's years of service to the university, the community and the athletics department, he has touched many, many lives," Urick said. "He has been a mentor, an adviser, a friend and a brother to many of us. Veryl always will be an important part of the K-State family."

Monday's celebration will include a reception for students and student athletes with Switzer at 6 p.m. on the west concourse of Bramlage Coliseum.

A charter member of the K-State Sports Hall of Fame, Switzer earned All-America status for the Cats as a record-setting running back and defensive back.

Dick Towers, Switzer's collegiate roommate and former teammate, said the dominating play of the Nicodemus, Kan. native was a level above any Wildcat past and present.

"I can tell you without hesitation, as far as I'm concerned he's the best football player we've ever had," Towers said. "He could play offense and defense today."

The athletic accolades Switzer earned at K-State led to his selection by the Green Bay Packers with the fourth overall pick in the 1954 NFL draft. Switzer played professional football for five years.

Off the field, Switzer's effect has spread to many different facets of the community.

Serving as associate dean and assistant vice president for university minority affairs from 1973 to 1988 and in numerous different areas since, Urick said Switzer has built a reputation as an individual willing to assist anyone.

"I think that as a mentor and nurturer of young people," he said, "Veryl always has a helping hand to offer."

Even before he was involved in administrative positions at K-State, Switzer's humanity and good nature was evident. Towers said his long friendship with one of K-State's most respected alumni revealed the true character and integrity that distinguishes Switzer from others.

"Veryl's greatest attribute is that he is just an outstanding individual and person," Towers said. "To know Veryl is to know a great human being."

Another quality many pointed to was Switzer's humble attitude toward his achievements. Throughout his years of service to the university, Switzer always praised others instead of himself.

Informed of the planned week of celebrations in his honor, Switzer said he was excited about the celebration but was unsure why he was the focal point.

"I'm ecstatic about it," Switzer said. "I'm not sure I can explain the meaning. It's Jazz festival to feature clinics, performances

By CRISTY ANDERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State jazz lovers will be in for a treat when the annual K-State Jazz Festival takes place on Saturday, said Dennis Wilson, festival executive director and director of jazz studies at K-State.

The annual event will feature workshops and clinics for attending area schools, taught by jazz musicians, and will top off with a concert at 8 p.m. in McCain Auditorium.

During the day, guest artists will conduct workshops for students from more than 15 visiting schools. Schools attend the festival for educational seminars, lectures, instrumental clinics and concerts. Their performances are judged by music professors from around the country in the categories of both vocal and instrumental jazz.

"It is a great chance to learn from the best," said Adam Thiesen, sophomore in music education, who also will work as a festival volunteer.

This will be the first year the festival will award scholarships to students. The Berkeley College of Music will award more than $10,000 in prizes. One student from each participating high school will be presented with a scholarship.

This year's festival will honor the late jazz vocalist Sarah Vaughan. A recent proclamation signed by Governor Bill Graves declares Feb. 13 Sarah Vaughan Day in the state of Kansas, and a historical lecture series will be given in remembrance of Vaughan at 2 p.m. on Saturday in Forum Hall.

"She was called 'The Divine One' because she was so divine in her voice, and she was very sassy," Wilson said.

Those who miss the actual concert can hear it broadcast March 27 on "Jazzset with Branford Marsalis." A crew from the national radio program Jazzset will visit K-State to tape parts of the festival and conduct an educational workshop for students in the school of journalism and mass communications.

Thiesen said he thought it was an honor to have Jazzset visit K-State as part of the Jazz Festival.

To have Jazzset, a weekly program heard on National Public Radio, coming here to air the concert in March is a lot of exposure to the whole country," he said.

Jazzset will record the McCain concert which will feature the Vanguard Jazz Orchestra from New York and jazz vocalists Kevin Mahogany from Kansas City and Carmen Bradford from Los Angeles. The Vanguard Jazz Orchestra is currently up for a Grammy award for the best jazz big band in the country, Wilson said. The K-State jazz quintet, concert jazz ensembles and faculty from K-State's department of music will also perform.

In all, Wilson said, he enjoyed the festival's educational aspect.

"What I like about this festival is that it stays true to education first and serves all the students of K-State," he said. "I like it that it serves the community of Manhattan and the state of Kansas."

Police to issue penalty for people in back of pick-ups

The Riley County Police Department will be issuing stricter penalties to passengers who ride in the back of pick-up trucks and to the drivers of the vehicles. According to Kansas law, it is unlawful for any person to ride on top of any vehicle or upon any portion of it not designed or intended for use of passengers when the vehicle is in motion. The law specifically prohibits any passenger from riding in the cargo area of trucks. In the past, the RCPD generally has issued verbal warnings, which carry no penalty to violators. However, Lt. Gary Grubbs said the RCPD is going to pay particular attention to the problem due to the inherent danger involved.

"We are doing this because of the potential of injuries in accidents," Grubbs said. "It also will allow us to educate the public about an obscure law not known by all the citizens of Kansas."

The driver of the truck, the passenger or both can be cited when a violation occurs. The determination is made by the police officer at the scene.

Manhattan municipal court officials said the violation carries a maximum fine of $55 ($10 fine plus $45 in court costs). However, the exact amount of the fine is determined by the city judge.

Lt. Richard Herrman of the K-State Police said the campus police hand out warnings most of the time when a violation occurs.

"It is a problem on occasion, especially on football game days," he said. "We give out warnings most of the time, except in extreme cases."

Grubbs said that on Nov. 14, 1998, a passenger riding in the cargo area of a truck suffered serious neck injuries when he was ejected over the cab. The accident occurred at the intersection of North Manhattan Avenue and Laramie Street in Aggieville following K-State's football victory over Nebraska. Grubbs said this example showed what can happen to a passenger even when traveling at a slow speed.

"Students need to remember it is against city ordinance unless they are engaged in on-the-job activities," he said.

Seventh grader suspended for bringing gun to school

LAWRENCE — Two seventh-grade girls have been suspended from West Junior High after one of them came to school with an unloaded, non-working gun in her backpack.

The second girl was suspended because she knew the first one had the gun and didn't report it, assistant principal Bill Montgomery said.

School officials were notified by four other students who heard the girl with the gun talking about it in a restroom before classes Wednesday. Principal Michael Lowe sent a letter home with all students, stressing that no one was ever in any danger.

Montgomery praised students for quickly bringing the incident to the attention of school officials, and Lowe in his letter said "students who assisted reporting this incident are to be commended for their prompt, responsible action."

Mental exam approved for man charged in attacks

OLATHE, Kan. — A judge has approved a defense request for a mental examination to determine whether a 79-year-old man charged with attacking an elderly couple with a baseball bat is competent to stand trial.

The action in the case against Francis P. Doyle, of Prairie Village, came Thursday at a hearing in Johnson County District Court. Doyle is charged with first-degree murder in the death of Lawrence W. Kubik, 77, and attempted first-degree murder in the injury of his wife, Marguerite Bacher-Kubik, also 77.

They were attacked last week at their home in the Kansas City suburb of Leawood, and Kubik later died of his injuries.

Doyle, also charged with aggravated burglary, is an acquaintance of Bacher-Kubik, who married Kubik in November.

Jury finds gun makers liable in shooting deaths

NEW YORK — A federal jury found several gun makers liable Thursday in three of seven New York City-area shootings because of negligent marketing practices.

The sole survivor of the seven shootings, Steven Fox, 19, who was seriously wounded, was the recipient of $560,000 in damages paid by the industry.

Fox and the relatives of six homicide victims sued the gun industry in federal court in 1995. Like some of the lawsuits brought against big tobacco, this one accused the gun industry of negligently marketing a legal product.

During the month-long trial, they argued handgun makers oversupply gun-friendly markets, mainly in the South, aware that the excess guns flow into criminal hands via illegal markets in New York and other states.

The plaintiffs' lawyers accused the 25 defendants of dumping handguns onto the black market like "toxic waste," making no effort to remedy dishonest distributors. In a deposition, Robert Morris, head of Taurus International Manufacturing, Inc., conceded the company had "never cut off anybody ... for sloppy distribution practices."

Industry attorney James Dorr told the jury it was unfair to "hold the manufacturers of a lawful, legitimately sold product responsible for acts of outlaws who are totally outside their control. ... The case is simply wrong."

Iraqi no-fly zone violations prompt U.S. retaliation

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. warplanes attacked several Iraqi air defense sites Thursday after being targeted by radar or seeing Iraqi military planes violate no-fly zones, the Pentagon said.

The attacks occurred in both the northern and southern no-fly zones. In the north, U.S. fighter jets were targeted by radar in each incident. In the south, Air Force and Navy fighter jets struck two anti-aircraft missile sites, radar and equipment after a pair of Iraqi MiG-23s flew into the no-fly zone. It was the second clash in two days in the south.

Navy Capt. Michael Doubleday, a Pentagon spokesman, said U.S. forces have had a "grave impact" on Iraq's integrated air defense system and pilots were choosing targets carefully. "We keep an eye on sites we feel are threatening to coalition forces," he said.

U.S. pilots returned safely Thursday to their bases, according to the Pentagon, which denied a report by the official Iraqi News Agency that Iraqi gunners hit an allied plane in the north.

"Such reports by the Iraqis in the past have been very questionable and I have no reason to believe this is anything other than the same," Col. Richard Bridges, a Pentagon spokesman, said.

Iraq said two civilians were killed and several others injured. The U.S. European Command, which oversees the northern zone, said a damage assessment was being done.

An Air Force F-15E bombed an Iraqi surface-to-air missile communications site at about 12:30 p.m. after its pilot saw anti-aircraft artillery fire and his plane was illuminated by radar near Mosul, U.S. officials said. Two other F-15Es launched an AGM-130 missile and dropped four GBU-12 precision-guided bombs on the site.

About an hour later, U.S. warplanes struck other Iraqi surface-to-air missile and communication sites near Mosul after being targeted three times by radar, U.S. officials said.

Matt Nisbet, public relations director for the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal, speaks before a crowd of about 50 on Thursday night in the Union Flint Hills Room.

'X-Files' might affect perceptions

■ UPC speaker talks about danger of media's portrayal of science.

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Increased television and print media reports of paranormal experiences are swaying public opinion, leading it away from skepticism and critical thinking, said Matt Nisbet, public relations director for the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal.

In his presentation, "Skeptics Versus 'The X-Files': Media and the Paranormal," he said the media launch claims into the public agenda. The presentation, which was 7 p.m. Thursday in the K-State Student Union, focused on the effects of increased reports of paranormal occurrences.

"It's a given that our society has changed because of the media," Nisbet said. "It has powerful influences on public opinion."

He said the worst case scenario with the trend would be a muddling of science funding or a generation that lacks critical thinking skills.

"Skepticism is an open inquiry," Nisbet said. "It is important to keep an open mind, follow the evidence to where it leads you, then draw a conclusion."

Journalists' lack of science knowledge often provides inaccurate depictions of the paranormal and fuels this country's fascination with the subject, he said.

Inaccurate portrayals of scientists also contribute to the problem, Nisbet said.

"Scientists are usually portrayed as mentally deranged or nerds," he said. "There are very few positive depictions of scientists."

"Jurassic Park" serves as an example.

"Science is able to produce these dinosaurs, but science is unable to control these dinosaurs," Nisbet said. "The X-Files" normally concludes with the scientific explanation of an experience losing to a paranormal reason, he said.

Nisbet said profit motives and the globalization of American media are contributing to the increase in paranormal occurrences on television because sex, violence and the paranormal make money.

Troy Murray, senior in humanities, said he attended the presentation after beginning to watch "The X-Files" a few months ago. After gaining more understanding of the show, he said he became a regular viewer.

"It was a show that my roommates always watched," he said. "I didn't understand it at first, but then I started watching it more."

Murray said he is a skeptic, and he wanted to hear Nisbet's presentation.

"I'm glad I came out. I liked it pretty much," he said. "He talks a lot about skeptics, but he didn't question science. He questions everything else except that."

The presentation was sponsored by Individuals for FreeThought and the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas committee.

Nisbet said he is traveling the country to spread the word, and hopes more people become skeptical of paranormal experiences and other aspects of life.

"The real challenge is to go beyond the core skeptics and expand it out to university students and others out there," he said. "The challenge to do that is becoming more important."

Radio station lost more than $51,000 on May 'Springfest'

■ Without privilege fee, JMC director says KSDB might be shut down.

By CAIT PURINTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KSDB-FM 91.9 has put in a request to Student Senate to pay off the remaining debt from last year's Springfest 98 and other operations that have yet to be specified.

An internal audit that will be released in the next few weeks will illustrate where and how more than $40,000 of the radio station's money was spent. Todd Simon, director of A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said the audit looks at business and financial affairs, but it doesn't focus on the total amount.

"It doesn't show some of the activities," Simon said.

He said when the radio station went into debt, it began pulling funds from other sources. He said the radio station used all of the savings in their underwriting accounts at the KSU Foundation, which at one time amounted to $8,000 to $10,000. Simon said $13,000 was taken from the journalism school.

The debt still remains. Last May, the radio station's advisory board was under the impression it would spend $15,000 to $18,000 on Springfest 98, Simon said. The total cost was $59,176.

The amount lost from the concert is approximately $51,500, according to the station manager's report.

Simon said the contracts for the concert were given to him three days before the highly-publicized event, and he wasn't going to cancel it at that time.

"So of course I signed it," he said.

Simon said the loss from the concert is only a portion of the deficit.

A bill introduced in Thursday's Senate meeting asked for a one-time allocation to the station of $42,783.

The bill was held for referral and will go back to the Privilege Fee Committee on Sunday evening.

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Jeff Meder said the amount specified in the bill would be reduced because they cannot take money from the reserve accounts to pay off foundation accounts.

The committee has seen the preliminary audit, which Senate hasn't seen yet. Meder said Senate will probably wait to see the internal audit when it comes out before dealing with the bill.

"My committee at this point is satisfied with the information we have," Meder said.

Another bill, which was introduced at the meeting, would increase the Wildcat 91.9 privilege fee from $35,056 a year to $51,332.

The increase would go to increasing the salary and benefits for the station manager.

The bill, as introduced, would allocate funds for only the next fiscal year.

"I would love to see both bills pass,"

Simon said. "That's what it boils down to, really. If they don't pass the deficit bill, we'll have a hard time running things."

He said if the operating fees do not pass, Wildcat 91.9 will have to be shut down, unless someone gives the station $35,000.

Concerned students at the Senate meeting requested the bills be tabled until an investigation is done on what they feel are discrimination issues within the station.

Simon said he would be in favor of an independent investigation.

"I'd welcome a third party into looking at what's happened here," Simon said.

Senate also took final action on a resolution increasing financial aid and on a resolution supporting lobbying for faculty salary increases on State Education Day, Feb. 16.

A bill introduced would increase funding for Hale Library by increasing tuition.

There was no amount specified. Student support from the bill would help university officials get additional funding from the state.

Meder said the bill is still vague at this point because he and Student Body President Tracey Mann are waiting to meet with University Provost James Coffman.

Aggieville should stay entertainment district

Aggieville always has been synonymous with K-State. Over the course of its 110 years it has grown into the night place of choice for students.

Even though the Aggieville Business Association hopes to transform the image into more of a shopping district, chances are it always will be known for its restaurants and bars.

Therefore, considerations like the expansion of Aggieville parking and bringing in national retail chains, like the Gap or Old Navy, should be taken with a grain of salt. While those issues are important to the future of daytime businesses, Aggieville is undeniably an entertainment district.

Sure, it would be great to have a nationally known chain so close to campus, but it probably would make more sense for those chains to be located at Manhattan Town Center or on the west side of town. If people have trouble parking, it's assumed they have a car. If they have a car, going a couple of miles away is not any huge sacrifice.

Since the Aggieville fire a year ago, rumors have been circulating about the plans for the empty lot that was created. Some argue it should be turned into a parking lot, others even propose using the space to build a parking garage. The right answer? Keep with tradition — make it a local business such as a bar or eating establishment.

There is valid reason to want to improve Aggieville where it is weakest, but it makes more sense to concentrate on where it is strongest.

Aggieville's claim to fame probably will always be its nightlife. That's something its frequenters have decided and the ABA will have to deal with.

I'd like everybody to stop talking about the DB92 radio station, because quite frankly, it's getting on my nerves, and I'm sick of reading it in the paper.

I think it is terrible how homophobic people are. Everyone is making a huge stink about the Teletubbies. I think the show is great, and if Tinky Winky is portraying a gay character, maybe the preschoolers today will become a more accepting generation.

In regards to Brad Seabourn's letter criticizing Pastor Aldrich's letter, aren't you above putting words in people's mouths?

It kills me to see that when a group of people on this campus stand up for what they believe in, everybody wants to cut them down. Nobody's getting to the source of the problem.

Claims of racism in letter ignore importance of majority opinion

Editor,

This is in response to Geoff Doyle's letter to the editor in Thursday's paper. I find it disgusting that someone could be so presumptuous.

I agree that racism might be more subtle than a lynching; however, I think Doyle needs to read the definition of racism. Racism occurs when an unfavorable act is directed at a person or persons because of their race. This does not include pros and cons that arise due to the impossibility of satisfying everyone.

To view the situation in simpler terms will help explain. It is impossible to satisfy everyone, and due to the many different races, creeds and colors in this country, we deal with this problem every day. When the opinion of the majority is the deciding factor, which is usually the case considering that is the concept the country is founded upon, for some reason ignorant people scream racism, when in fact it is the only way to satisfy the most people.

This is obvious if you consider the alternative, which is to satisfy the minority and disregard the majority. That seems rather ignorant. So we attempt to come to a happy medium that will satisfy all. This does not always work, but to consider it racism is ridiculous. None of the actions taken or comments made were done due to the color of someone's skin.

I applaud Danedri Thompson's column for saying so eloquently what so many of us felt.

OPINION

Arguments draw couples closer, not apart

It is unavoidable that when two people are together in each other's presence long enough, conflict eventually will occur, even when the couple is in love.

This Sunday, millions of couples will express their love for each other explicitly by exchanging tokens of their affection. I used to be cynical about Valentine's Day. I just assumed that it was some kind of corporate conspiracy invented by Hallmark so as to make a buck during the five-month lull between Christmas/New Year's and the other Hallmark-invented holiday, Mother's Day.

While this is partly true, it turns out that the tradition of expressing one's love for another on Feb. 14 dates back to the Middle Ages and has nothing to do with some guy who happened to be martyred back in the third century and who is so religiously unimportant that his feast day is no longer celebrated.

The tradition of giving tokens of one's affection has its origin with people choosing to be physically intimate with one another at the time the birds returned from their winter migration and formed mating pairs. Coincidentally, the migrational return of French birds and St. Valentine's feast day both just happen to occur the second week in February. Thus, over time, the two events became linked.

Even if Valentine's Day is some kind of corporate conspiracy, explicitly expressing one's love to that person of most importance is in itself not such a bad idea. Just because, more often than not, it is a bad thing when megacorporations manipulate the culture in order to increase their wealth (e.g., how we are all made to feel ugly and inadequate unless we wear their useless makeup, smoke their brand of cigarette or use their laundry detergent to make our brights as bright as they can be), it doesn't necessarily have to be a bad thing every time. What's the big deal if Hallmark gets a buck fifty out of me if in return I can make my someone special feel as if they are someone special?

Unfortunately for me, this understanding came a little late in the game. I've recently gone through two breakups in rapid succession, and for the first time since President Reagan's first term in office, I have no valentine to give a valentine to this Sunday.

Now the pitiful and lonely situation I've put myself into wasn't solely the result of being the insensitive male on Feb. 14 (I finally did come to my senses the last several years before the first breakup and started to give Valentine's Day cards — needless to say, homemade), but the tardiness of my realization didn't help matters out much.

This brings me back to my opening premise: Conflict is inevitable in any couple relationship (and God knows how I know about conflict). So as my Valentine's Day token of affection to whomever might be reading this, here is my advice on how to fight with the one you love.

Anger and hate go hand in hand, but anger and love is a twisted emotional mix. Always be conscious that this person you're angry with is also the person you love. So to get anger and love emotionally hand in hand, hold hands while you fight. In this manner, as the anger is passed verbally, the love still is being passed physically.

Holding hands also serves another purpose: It helps you fight fair. Being intimately close to someone, one learns the vulnerabilities of one's partner. In the heat of an argument, it is easy to exploit these vulnerabilities in the other unfairly as a way of hurting the other in return. The point of the fight is not to destroy the other person, but to get closer, maybe even more so than before the fight. The love being passed by holding hands prevents you from hitting below the belt.

If your partner does something that upsets you, deal with it right away. I myself used to avoid dealing with my anger immediately. I would stew over the situation, which then resulted in resentment. Then I would stew over the resentment. The sooner you can deal with the problem, the sooner you can let it pass.

The exception to this rule is if you're the type of person who becomes irrationally enraged at the slightest provocation. Seek professional help. In the meantime, it might be better to cool down first, then have your chat with your partner.

Shut up for a second and listen to your partner's concerns.

If you need to defend yourself, don't do so by invalidating your partner's reason for being upset. Whether you think the reason for your partner's anger is rational or not, the anger is real. Through invalidation, people show their partners that they are insignificant to them and that they truly don't care about them or their needs.

Deal with the present situation. Don't bring up the past.

Once you realize you're the person at fault, look your partner in the eyes and say you're sorry. Don't leave it there; also ask for forgiveness. This allows both of you to be involved in the resolution. Once forgiveness is given, the argument is settled. This also helps prevent the particular situation that was just argued from being brought up again in the future. It can't be, because it was forgiven.

Remember that an argument is not a competition. As author Susan Page has written, "Competition brings nothing but unhappiness, for someone must always come out the loser." A fight is only successful if both within the relationship win.

Some of these words of wisdom I knew and practiced before my relationships fell apart; some, maybe the more important ones, I learned after. I do feel that in certain ways, after all was said and done, I am closer with my exes (if not close in that one particular way, if you know what I mean). This just goes to show you that if handled correctly, sex doesn't have to ruin a beautiful friendship.

Have a happy Valentine's Day.

Friends use positive attitudes to overcome adversity

Pain is inevitable, but misery is optional. At first these words just went in one ear and out the other, but after a while, I realized they still were looming around in my mind. It's true. None of us can escape all heartache, loss, defeat, criticism and failure, but we sure have the choice of how we react to these inevitabilities.

The longer these thoughts lingered, more and more people from the past and present came to mind. It dawned on me that most of the people who smile all of the time are the very people who have the most reasons to lament. Friends with abusive parents or partners, friends with fatal illnesses, friends with family problems — they all strive to make others smile. They are some of the most unselfish, giving people I have had the fortune to meet.

There undoubtedly will be some boy or girl in your life who will break your heart. A potential employer who will hire someone else. A friend who will betray. A loved one who will die. Hurt is unavoidable. How will you deal with these obstacles? Instead of wallowing in self-pity, choose to say "Failure? No, it's just a temporary setback," or be mature enough to thank someone for offering an opinion even though it ripped you apart inside. A positive attitude isn't always easy. In fact, the only surefire way to achieve this pinnacle is if your view of the world around you changes.

My dad has a saying on his refrigerator: Ideas become thoughts, thoughts become beliefs, beliefs become actions, and actions become ways of life. So maybe the best way to see the world in a different light is to start with one occurrence that could be negative but choose to see it as a positive instead.

For high school graduation, my church gave me a journal. For 3 1/2 years it has been sitting on my bookshelf collecting dust. This year is different. One of my New Year's resolutions is to write down three positive things that happen to me every day. This documentation is really working. My days are now spent looking for pleasant happenings to write down for that night. Most of the setbacks or obstacles I encounter are a thing of the past. No stewing allowed.

Somewhere in my vats of spam e-mail, there was a forward about a man who had such a positive attitude that he was able to joke even when faced with death. He made up his mind that he wasn't going to die from a bullet wound he had received. He decided to live. While in the emergency room, the nurse asked him if he was allergic to anything. His only reply: "Bullets." He made all of the doctors and nurses laugh. It takes a phenomenally strong person to remain positive.

On a more personal note, a good friend I've had since elementary school hasn't had the best of luck with her health. In junior high, the school nurse discovered Sara had a severe case of scoliosis, the curvature of the spine. She would either have to wear a back brace for a couple of years or go through painful back surgery. Then, as if that wasn't enough, a few years later Sara was diagnosed with lupus, a disease of the blood and joints. Sickness would grab her for weeks on end; she couldn't move her hands or get out of bed sometimes.

Yet through it all, she is still one of the smartest, wittiest, most beautiful people I know. She graduated as valedictorian from high school, she received a presidential scholarship to attend a prestigious college on the East Coast, and I think I have seen her in a less-than-happy mood only once since third grade. Phenomenal woman.

At the risk of sounding like Pollyanna and becoming too sappy for my own taste, there's a story in "Chicken Soup for the Soul" about a man and wife who had a pretty ordinary life. So ordinary, in fact, that they had their squabbles just like the rest of us. But the arguments started to take over everyday life. Sarcasm eventually overcame compliments. But one day, out of the blue, the husband started complimenting his wife. She didn't know what to do. But he kept doing it, day after day despite her cynical retorts. Eventually, the compliments boosted her self esteem and she started giving them back to her husband.

Arguments happen. Are you going to let them control you? Don't sweat it. No matter what happens today, keep a smile on your face. It's hard sometimes. Are you strong enough to have a positive attitude? Happy Valentine's Day!

New lingerie styles fulfill Valentine's Day fantasies

Ahhhhhh! Me Tarzan, me Jane. The ideal couple, romantically clothed. A French loincloth Speedo for him and matching G-string for her, both in cheetah print.

You, too, can fulfill your fantasies this Valentine's Day with the gift of lingerie. This year's lingerie collections will have you swinging from the trees in lavish detail, with a little slice of love.

The gift of lingerie on Valentine's Day is not just about the color red anymore. No, darlings, it's about comfort, coverage, shaping and surprising your sweetheart. Accentuate the positive; eliminate the negative. There are timeless classics for everyone and perhaps the right "peek-a-boo" for you.

This February, I took a peek at what savory, exquisite lingerie had hit the store racks. After much scrutiny in the Wal-Mart flannel section, I derived the satisfaction of thumbing through the mother of all catalogs — Victoria's Secret. Men, I'll let you in on a little secret. Victoria's is the way to her heart. Besides, where else can you shop for your significant other and at the same time view half-naked women? Victoria's is your Dr. Love's, the potion that promises "Gifts From The Heart."

The February edition displays the ever-so-popular chemise, teddy and adjustable garters. And who could forget The Miracle Bra. The new bra is now seamless inside and out. The miracle is sewing five feet of revolutionary padding into the bra without using one seam.

Remember last season's line of Angels? Well, now Victoria's is introducing Dream Angels — a bra so impossibly romantic and incredibly heavenly, it guarantees your dreams come true.

Now that's a powerful bra. OK, so maybe Second Skin Satin and Chantilly lace is not your idea of sheer bliss.

Varieties of cotton knits are offered in black floral, hearts and multi-stripe prints. These jerseys feel more pyjama-like and underline the comfort of everyday wear.

There is still time to order from the Victoria's Secret catalog, but the package might not reach you in time for the big day or night. Don't fear; Patricia's Undercover is here.

I dropped by Patricia's in Aggieville to browse and maybe try on something silky. I talked with salesperson Teresa Purvis, who pointed out a few pairs of crotchless panties and heart-printed boxers. "You have to have one outrageous thing," she said.

Purvis said the popularity of the velvet bustier has sent the lingerie flying out the door. The bustier seems to be this year's top-seller. Prices are not a big concern. Patricia's offers panty piles, $5 each and three for $12. Lace garters sell anywhere from $3 to $5. Prices for lingerie range anywhere from $18 up to $46 for stretch lace and babydolls.

So spend the day a little smoother, a little sensual, and treat yourself or someone special to the ultimate Valentine's indulgence.

Patricia's is full of little surprises and different colors. My personal favorite, the his/her tuxedo thongs are great for all occasions, whether attending a New Year's Eve party or that special wedding. Purvis recommends suiting up in the undergarments while cooking dinner at home. Remember to keep the drapes shut, or your neighbors might want to eat, too.

And his/her Tarzan and Jane lingerie? I think I'll just wait for the creation of Clinton and Lewinsky lingerie. I always wanted to wear a red beret.

Condom day to be observed Sunday

By BRIAN HERNANDEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Not only is Sunday Valentine's Day, it also is National Condom Day, sponsored by the American Social Health Association. It is the ninth year the ASHA has sponsored the single-day event.

Allison Wright Kalloo, ASHA director of public relations, said National Condom Day was started in 1991 as a lighthearted attempt to raise awareness about sexually transmitted disease issues.

Kaloo said the ASHA's message is simple for those who choose to be sexually active.

"We want to let the sexually active know condom use is the only answer, short of abstinence," she said. "Our main goal is to get partners to talk and be open about the use of condoms in their relationship."

Kaloo said the campaign has been successful in its nine years, but there still are some issues to address.

"Our society must stem the tide of STD rates," she said. "The rates have risen between the ages of 15 to 24 because of lack of safe sex, and that is a problem."

Kaloo said she believes the higher rates have to do with the age of first sexual encounter, the number of partners one has and the feelings of immortality people have toward sex.

She also said it is important that those who are sexually active do not feel as though either their partner or themselves are free of disease. The only way to know is to be tested regularly and have an open line of communication with a health-care provider.

Reita Currie, K-State's health educator, said K-State's message this year is the same as it has been in the past.

"Those who decide to participate in sexual behavior must use protection," she said. "It is not 100-percent free of risks, but it is better than nothing at all. It is important that everyone act responsibly in order to protect themselves and their partner."

Currie said the university has no special program planned in conjunction with National Condom Day this year because of lack of staff in the Department of Health Education.

However, Lafene Health Center does offer information on condoms, STDs and other sexually related material through the STD, HIV, and AIDS Peer Educators program. Students volunteer their time to make others aware of the sexual issues that face society. Groups interested in scheduling a SHAPE presentation should contact the health education department at 532-6595.

Beanie Baby show to help fund student's trip

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hard-to-find Beanie Babies will be available to collectors in Manhattan this weekend.

The Beanie Baby Bonanza show and sale will be from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Saturday at Pottorf Hall in CCo Park. Admission for the event will be $1, and children age 12 and under will get in free with an adult.

More than 15 second-hand dealers will have booths set up to show, sell and trade the collectible toys and accessories.

Sherry Wheeler, show coordinator, said the dealers are from Kansas, Oklahoma, Missouri and Nebraska and have purchased their collections from stores just like everyone else. These dealers possess many Beanie Babies that are not available from Manhattan merchants.

"This is probably the only way to get the retired bears or the brand-new ones," Wheeler said. "A lot of them work through the Internet so they can come to these shows loaded with ones that are hard to find."

Signature, Millennium, Holly, Halo, Eggbert, Scorch and Valentina are a handful of the more popular and hard-to-find beanie characters that will be available at the show.

Even though so many of the rare toys will be available, the prices should be reasonable enough for collectors to be able to purchase those absent from their collections, Wheeler said.

"The fact that there are going to be 15-plus dealers means the prices will be down so the dealers can sell their products," Wheeler said. "I think people will be relatively surprised at the reasonable costs."

Wheeler said she expects many characters to be available for sale in the range of $10 to $20.

Local collectors who do not have their own booths will be allowed to bring up to five toys from their collections to trade or sell to the dealers. Wheeler said this would give the public an opportunity to sell or trade some of their doubles for missing links in their personal collections.

A Beanie Baby version of musical chairs and drawings for prizes will take place throughout the day. Wheeler said money raised from this portion of the event would be donated to Aaron Hall, a Manhattan High School student who is working toward an exchange trip to Switzerland.

"The beaniees are really a lot of fun, but when you use them as a fund-raiser it even adds more enjoyment to it," Wheeler said.

Cats face tough Tigers

■ K-State to meet 14th-ranked Clemson on road.

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team hits the road again on today, beginning a three-game series at 14th-ranked Clemson that concludes on Sunday.

The Wildcats (1-2) are coming off of a Showdown in the Desert performance that saw the Cats drop their first two games to Oregon State and San Diego State before returning to defeat the Ducks in the tournament finale.

K-State faces a tougher test in Clemson, a team that finished nationally ranked last season at 43-15. In 1998, the Tigers hit an Atlantic Coast Conference-best .326 and had an on-base percentage of .434.

"This team will be a good challenge for us," head coach Mike Clark said.

"We will need to keep them off the bases to have a chance to win."

The two key Tigers to keep in check are sophomore center fielder Patrick Boyd and second baseman Kurt Bultmann. Boyd was named a preseason first team All-American by Baseball America and played last summer for the USA national team.

Bultmann was a first-team ACC selection and a career .310 hitter for the Tigers. The tandem will bat either second and third, as it did last year, or first and second, with Boyd leading off.

In addition to excellent hitting, Clemson also possesses a solid pitching staff, led by junior third-team preseason all-American Ryan Mottl, who finished last season with a 9-4 record as a starter. As with Boyd, Mottl also played last summer with the USA national team.

"Clemson has always had great pitching," Clark said. "That tradition carries over to this year."

For the Cats, the starting rotation will be the same as last weekend, with senior Brandon Peck starting today, senior Derek Andersen on Saturday and junior Jason Wells on Sunday.

Despite the struggles the starting pitchers had in Arizona — only Wells escaped with a win — the area requiring the most improvement is from the plate.

"We struck out way too much," Clark said. "We need to make adjustments to breaking pitches and get more contact."

K-State's leading batsman entering the series, junior second baseman Chad Tabor, is looking forward to a matchup with Clemson and remains positive, despite facing one of the best teams in the nation.

"Even though we're a really young team," Tabor said. "I'm much more confident in this team than last year's."

Tennis team searches for remedy

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A healthier K-State tennis team will be back in action this weekend in Salt Lake City. On Valentine's Day, the Wildcats face Utah, and Monday they play 18th-ranked Brigham Young University.

Head coach Steve Bietau said he remains optimistic despite the Cats' winless record.

"When we left the Tulsa match, there were a lot of things that I liked about the way our team was playing," he said. "It sounds crazy to be 0-5 and talk about how well we are playing."

The Wildcats should head into Utah with more healthy players than they had two weeks ago, since Kathy Chuda has recovered from the flu.

"She's a little behind because she missed most of two weeks, but she's healthy now. It is going to be a matter of getting her timing back," Bietau said.

Freshman Alena Jecminkova is still indefinite for this weekend's contest against Utah and BYU.

"Her condition is improving, but I'm not sure if she will be ready this weekend," Bietau said.

Despite Chuda and Jecminkova's statuses improving, Bietau said Eva Novotna's condition has not changed.

"I think her eyes are getting a little bit better, but it is still a factor when she plays," he said.

There might be changes in the singles line-up. The doubles pairing will change depending on the health of Jecminkova. Chuda will join Martina Popisilova on the No. 1 doubles team.

"Practice has been good," Bietau said. "We are trying to keep our players focused on improving. I think that has gone well."

Bietau is pleased with the play of Popisilova against tough competition.

"I would say about 85 percent of the players in the country would have the same record she does given who she has played," he said.

"When you look at how she's playing, she is doing everything right."

Although K-State has matched up relatively close with Utah in the past, last year the Wildcats lost to Utah 5-4 in Manhattan, while BYU beat the Cats 6-3 last year.

"Utah is a team we have always been pretty close with. We have had some very good matches against them," Bietau said. "It's a good rivalry."

"BYU have lost some people from last year, but they remain very strong," Bietau said.

This weekend is the final tune-up for the Cats before their first home match. Next weekend, Wichita State comes to Manhattan for a match.

LOOKING AHEAD

Weekend road win would move Cats closer to postseason play

The K-State women's basketball team has the opportunity to take a big step toward postseason play when it takes on Oklahoma on Saturday in Norman, Okla.

With a victory, the Wildcats can move to 7-5 in the Big 12 Conference and possibly take sole possession of fourth place.

K-State (13-8, 6-5 Big 12) will attempt to extend its two-game winning streak. On Wednesday, the Cats defeated Iowa State 70-63 to put them in a tie for fourth place with Texas.

Cats guard Kim Woodlee said the team needed the win against Iowa State.

"We needed that win," Woodlee said. "We're at a point right now in the season where we can win every game, or lose every game we're in."

Against Oklahoma, the team will be without the services of forward Angie Finkes. Finkes, who is second on the team in rebounding and the second-leading scorer, is out with a leg injury.

Head coach Deb Patterson said Finkes will be out a minimum of two weeks, and she has been pleased with her team's ability to replace Finkes.

In Finkes' absence-forward Brandy Harris stepped up and scored a career-high 21 points. It was a game in which Harris said she knew she had to step up.

"Coach Patterson actually never said anything to me," Harris said. "I just wanted to go out there and step up."

The win against Iowa State was the team's third over ranked opponents this season.

"It's nice to be able to say that this is a level you are capable of competing at and playing with anybody," Patterson said.

Oklahoma enters the game having defeated Oklahoma State 61-53. The Sooners, who are 11-10 overall, have been unbeatable at home in conference play. The Sooners start three freshman and are led by junior Phylesha Whaley.

Whaley, who this week was named the Big 12 player of the week, leads the team in scoring with 19.8 points per game and is the team's leading rusher.

Last week in two games, Whaley averaged 22.5 points and 8.5 rebounds per game. Her performance helped lead the Sooners to victories over Texas and Texas A&M.

For the Cats, it will be yet another road challenge game as Patterson's team continues to grow.

Patterson said Oklahoma plays a fast-paced style of play, and she said it will be a test of her team's ability to make adjustments.

"Oklahoma likes to run 94 feet, and it's a matter of being able to learn to adjust," Patterson said. "In this league there is always a challenge."

Woodlee said the contest in Norman is a must-win road game for the Wildcats.

"We need to beat them there," Woodlee said. "That is going to be a big game down there."

Patterson said as her team continues to compete they will become consistent.

"We need to continue to develop consistency in these games, each game right now propels us to the next one," Patterson said. "There is no substitute for success, clearly success breeds success."

Whether sun or rain, Sprewell or Rodman, the unknown leaves columnist wondering

There are three things I really know in this world.

One, I should forget about student loans and just have my parents become International Olympic Committee members. Two, you weren't a good debater in high school unless you could spin your pencil on your fingertips. And three, neither the Kansas City Royals nor the Kansas City Chiefs will ever win another championship while I am still alive, simply to spite me.

This leaves me with a whole bunch of unknowns, like why was it 70 degrees on Wednesday and 20 on Thursday? Something else I don't understand is why the 123rd Annual Westminster Kennel Club Dog Show was televised. Who in their right mind actually would sit down and watch two nights of dogs walking around? To tell you the truth, I did. It was either that or read Henry James.

I must admit, I was sort of captivated watching the crowd give standing ovations to all the dogs. I guess some people are easily entertained. I think next year I'll enter a dog in the competition, a real dog. I'll get an old mutt with some burrs in its fur, and we'll run out there and talk trash to all the other dogs.

Maybe we'll even start a dog fight. It'll be fun. Anyway, some little, fluffy, black-and-white dog won, but who really cares? I'll bet you my dog could whip that sad excuse for a dog any day. The most entertaining moment of the whole show was when some German short-hair got a little nervous and squatted in front of the judges.

Something else I don't know is why, oh why, did the New York Knicks trade for Latrell Sprewell? What was the front office thinking? Let me see if I can get this straight. While with the Golden State Warriors, Sprewell choked his coach during practice, left practice, then came back and tried to attack him again, accused him of racism, sued when he was subsequently fired — and so the Knicks were willing to give up John Starks, Chris Mills and Terry Cummings for him? I had a feeling that it was a bad trade to start with, but now that Sprewell has broken his heel two games into the season, it's pretty much common knowledge. For a more professional opinion, I sought out the sage advice of Bob, the Collegian's basketball analyst.

"That trade was really stupid." You must admit, he reeks of wisdom, and something else I can't quite place. Anyway, there is also talk now of getting Dennis Rodman to take Sprewell's place while he is out. They must attract some fairly strange people up there in New York.

My final unknown is the tried and true question, "why do athletes get paid a bazillion dollars to play sports?" I honestly couldn't tell you. If I were an owner, I don't think I'd give my life savings to people to throw a ball through a hoop. If they are worth so much money, how come people who are the best, say, insurance salesman, aren't worth the same amount of money? Example: I'll bet you I am one of the greatest dishwashers in the world; I'm like poetry in motion with a stack of dirty dishes. However, you don't see Sirlain Stockade offering me a 7-year, $105 million contract a la Kevin Brown. Maybe I should hire an agent.

Written correctly, letters help convey love, romance

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shakespeare put it nicely: "Shall I compare thee to a summer's day? Thou art more lovely and more temperate..." When it comes to writing love letters and poems, many people aren't quite so romantic with words.

This Valentine's Day, a special someone can be wooed with a homemade love letter or poem by following a few tips.

An important step in writing a good love letter or poem is research. Go to the library and find out what the professionals have done.

"Check out some books by 20th century poets, and see how they write their love poems," Christopher Cokinos, assistant professor of English, said.

Be careful that the writing is for a modern audience.

"Shakespeare was a wonderful writer and his work — like much classic work — persists because of its beauty and insight," Cokinos said. "But unless you usually talk like Shakespeare, why try to write like him? Anyhow, who can? Leave the 'thees' and 'thous' to the dead poets."

The obvious topic of a love letter or poem is love, but finding a way to express it can be difficult.

"Try reading some romantic sonnets to get the feel for writing a poem, and give it a shot," Drew Brown, graduate student in English, said.

Brown recommends writing something simple and short that fits on one page and gets right to the point.

He suggests adding humor to your letter to make your Valentine smile.

"It's good to make it a little lighter, so it doesn't seem sappy," Brown said. "Think about the person you're writing to."

Charles Peitsch, graduate student in creative writing, said he likes to make up silly poems to make his girlfriend laugh.

"There's nothing wrong with being cheesy," Peitsch said. "They'll still say it's cute, even if it's really bad."

Love is a broad topic, so Cokinos offers some aspects of love as possible topics.

"You could imagine the ideal romantic moment or the ideal future, but since we tend not to live up to ideals, why put that burden on yourself?" he said. "Many modern poets focus on moments — the way a lover's skin looked in a certain light at dusk, the way the pollen from a pine cone dusted your lover's hair as you walked through a grove. Memories are made of those moments that are as recent as yesterday or as distant as years ago."

The appearance and presentation of a Valentine's Day letter or poem are almost as important as the message.

Brown said something handwritten is more personal than a typed letter or poem.

"Your handwriting reminds them of you," Brown said.

Or, go for an approach that is more original by reading the poem or letter out loud to your Valentine, he said.

"Speaking your poem out loud, either from memory or reading it from your own page, is a wonderful way to make the poem a real gift," Cokinos said.

Peitsch even suggested singing the letter or giving it in bits and pieces like clues.

If none of these tips are inspiration enough to compile a romantic and loving Valentine's Day masterpiece, Cokinos gives a few last bits of advice.

"If you fail with your own poem, don't buy a Hallmark card," he said.

Copy an erotic poem by e.e. cummings, then recite it out loud to your Valentine, he said.

"But don't do this in public," he said. There is still hope for those who think they can't write a letter or poem.

"If you're not happy with the love poem you write, don't despair," Cokinos said. "There's always next year. And in the interim, you can take Introduction to Poetry Writing."

Cancer treatment results duplicated

By DANIEL Q. HANEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Government scientists finally have managed to duplicate a Harvard doctor's success with an experimental cancer treatment that wipes out tumors in mice and said they plan to begin human testing by the fall.

The closely watched developments involve a natural protein called endostatin. It and a sister protein called angiostatin both work — at least in mice — by blocking the tumors' ability to sprout new blood vessels.

This makes cancer either fall dormant or disappear altogether in lab animals. No one knows if the same thing will happen in people.

The two proteins have been the subject of a roller coaster of speculation ever since an enthusiastic front-page story in The New York Times last May on Dr.

Judah Folkman and his experiments. But doubts grew last fall when it was reported that scientists from the National Cancer Institute in Frederick, Md., had not been able to reproduce the results.

This week, an NCI team said it at last had duplicated Folkman's work. The breakthrough using endostatin came only when the NCI scientists conducted the experiments in Folkman's laboratory at Children's Hospital in Boston.

Thursday, another team of NCI researchers said it has begun designing endostatin studies in humans. The NCI wants to test the drug for safety in 10-30 patients with tumors of the breast, kidney, skin or other parts of the body.

"We are excited about this," said Dr. James Pluda, an NCI senior drug investigator. "If all goes well, we hope to begin by the third quarter of this year and earlier, if possible."

Pluda said it will take about six months to design the study before it can be submitted to the Food and Drug Administration for approval.

Endostatin and angiostatin are being developed by Entremed Inc., a small biotech company in Rockville, Md., whose stock price has risen and plunged with each bit of news about the drugs.

On Thursday, it said it is scaling up production of endostatin and will have enough for the preliminary human testing proposed by the NCI.

In recent months, NCI scientists in Frederick attempted without success to duplicate Folkman's work using endostatin shipped to them by his lab.

The researchers said they assumed technical problems, including possible trouble transporting the fragile protein, messed up their experiments. They traveled to Folkman's lab, where last month they finally succeeded in using the protein to shrink mouse tumors.

In a statement Thursday, the hospital hinted that the problem might have involved the proper way to inject mice with endostatin.

Next, Children's Hospital scientists will go to Frederick to help the NCI duplicate the experiments there.

At least one other team has independently published a report of similar success with endostatin, and the hospital said several others are nearing publication.

Entremed is developing endostatin alone. It had a venture with Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. to make angiostatin, but Bristol-Myers announced this week that it is pulling out because of difficulty producing reliable protein samples.

Entremed spokeswoman Mary P. Sundeen said the company is confident that it will be able to develop angiostatin alone. She said Entremed hopes to begin human studies of the protein late this year.

Senator wants law to stop continuous driving in left lane

By LEW FERGUSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Studies show that drivers hogging the center lane on super-highways are the biggest cause of road rage. Senate transportation chairman Ben Vidricksen said.

That is why he wants a bill drafted that would prohibit motorists from driving continuously in the left-hand lane on four-lane highways in Kansas.

"That is the No. 1 cause of road rage in the country," Vidricksen, R-Salina, said Thursday, after his committee discussed what can be done to reduce speeding and make highways safer.

To make highways safer, Vidricksen and Sen. Larry Salmans, R-Hanston, said something must be done to keep trucks from getting side-by-side on four-lane highways, preventing other vehicles from passing. The bill was a proposed solution: Slow the trucks down by 5 mph so others could get around them.

"I've seen them go side-by-side for miles and miles with 20 cars backed up behind them," Salmans said.

Vidricksen conceded the bill to reduce trucks' speed to 65 wasn't going anywhere based on the solid lineup of opposition to it.

He said he still wants to address the issue of trucks blocking traffic by running alongside each other, presumably with their accelerator governors or cruise controls set at identical speeds.

After a committee hearing, Vidricksen told Highway Patrol spokesman John Eichhorn he wants the patrol to research the issue and determine the feasibility of enacting a law that would prohibit any vehicle from traveling continuously on the left-hand side of four-lane highways.

He said an exception might be patrol trooper, who have difficulty using their radar from the right-hand lane to check speeds of oncoming traffic.

"There's no reason to be driving continuously in the left-hand lane," Vidricksen said. "I'd like to see the patrol and the (transportation) department do something about it, because that causes road rage."

Road rage has been described as people becoming so frustrated by the driving actions of others that they turn to violence to express their anger.

Vidricksen said he wants the Division of Motor Vehicles to stress in the state's driving manual that left-hand lane driving is wrong and perhaps post roadway signs calling it to drivers' attention.

Federal charges filed in DeBruce elevator blast

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The federal government has filed formal charges against DeBruce Grain Inc., alleging safety violations that investigators said caused a grain elevator explosion that killed seven workers.

The allegations filed Wednesday are nearly identical to the initial findings against the company, which were made public in December by the U.S. Department of Labor and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

The government is charging DeBruce with 36 counts of willful and serious violations of federal safety regulations at its elevator in Haysville, Kan. The civil charges carry fines of up to $1.7 million and possible criminal prosecution.

Federal prosecutors in Wichita confirmed Wednesday that they were continuing to review OSHA's allegations to determine whether criminal charges should be filed.

DeBruce, headquartered in North Kansas City, has contested the civil charges formally. The company will have the opportunity to defend itself later this year at a hearing before an OSHA review commission.

"To this day, we have not been given an opportunity to speak with any OSHA representative who was prepared to discuss our concerns," said Paul DeBruce, the company's founder and chief executive.

"Not only has there not been any give-and-take discussions on our information, but also we still have no idea how OSHA came up with many of its conclusions, which are in direct contradiction to the facts we have," DeBruce said.

For DeBruce's president, Larry T. Kittoe, the scenario is a familiar one.

In April 1980, Kittoe was branch manager in charge of a Pillsbury Co. grain elevator in St. Joseph when it exploded, killing one worker and injuring five others.

Kittoe said he didn't know how to respond to questions about his role in the two explosions.

"It is an unfortunate coincidence," said Kittoe, 48. "I guess I'm very unfortunate."

In both cases, OSHA investigators cited missing or faulty equipment meant to guard against unsafe conditions that can trigger explosions in the highly combustible "rain dust."

In the St. Joseph case, Pillsbury disputed OSHA's allegations, and the agency eventually dropped all charges against the company.

"The biggest difference between that experience and the one we're going through now is the amount of substantive communication we're having with OSHA," Kittoe said.

Kittoe and DeBruce said OSHA officials refuse to meet with top DeBruce executives to discuss the explosion, and appear to have their minds made up that the company is guilty.

An OSHA investigator has said a seized bearing in a grain-carrying conveyor belt caused friction and generated enough heat to ignite grain dust, which triggered subsequent explosions throughout the half-mile-long complex on June 8.

Kittoe said that even if a bearing had frozen up, the resulting friction from the conveyor belt passing over it would not generate enough heat to detonate grain dust.

"If he truly knew this industry, he would know those rollers don't heat up enough" to cause an explosion, DeBruce said.

"I put my hand on it," DeBruce said of an experiment carried out in recent months in which consultants hired by DeBruce re-created OSHA's scenario.

Clinic director begins weekly radio program

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dr. Wendy Blank, director of the Women's Clinic at Lafene Health Center, became interested in medicine in the sixth grade because of a science teacher.

"He was a great teacher," Blank said. "Teachers might not think they make a difference, but they really do."

Blank will be host to "Threesome at Four," which will be aired on KSDB-FM 91.9 each Friday from 4 to 5 p.m., beginning today. The show will be set up much the same way as MTV's "Loveline," and Blank will have two psychology interns from University Counseling Services at Lafene as co-hosts with her.

"Loveline" and the work Blank does at Lafene, helped her come up with the idea to start a radio program addressing issues from condoms and sexually transmitted diseases to relationships and alcohol abuse.

Before coming to Lafene in June 1998, Blank worked in private practice for six years in Kansas City, Mo. She decided to go into college health, because most of her patients were younger than 25, she said.

"At this age, I can impact their lives with the right information from the beginning on female issues," Blank said.

Blank said getting into the college health profession is not easy. An interested physician cannot call a campus health center and ask for a job. She said she had to network to get a job by talking to each Big 12 Conference university and universities in California.

"Lafene and K-State wanted a gynecologist on staff," Blank said. "Any doctor can see someone with a gynecology problem, but for major issues, students were referred out to a clinic. It is a big thing that a gynecologist is here now."

Blank said most universities across the nation do not have gynecologists on staff, mainly because more health centers deal with medical issues and want more family-practice specialists.

"This is a very rewarding career, because I am impacting lives with education on issues, and I know every day that I am making a difference," Blank said.

Lannie Zweimiller, Lafene Health Center director, said Blank understands the issues many young students face and has good communication skills to help them deal with these issues.

"She has a good rapport with the students and cannot only speak in a doctor's capacity, but speak in their environment," Zweimiller said.

Blank has been board-certified in obstetrics and gynecology since 1995. Board-certified requirements are passing written and oral tests, being in private practice for two to three years, a review of hospital charts, and another oral exam.

"It is not required for all doctors to be certified, although they should be," Blank said. "They haven't decided if we will have to recertify every few years, but they may in the future."

She said she hopes "Threesome at Four" will make students better informed about health issues.

"There are a lot of myths surrounding many of these issues," Blank said. "Only a small percentage actually come here, so this is a way for me to get the word out to a lot more people through the radio."

Zweimiller said Blank was energetic when she brought him the idea of doing the show. He said the program is a way for her to help students during different hours.

"She has a lot of experience in how to provide the information," Zweimiller said. "She will carry the program off in a good way and benefit the students."

Blank said she hopes that through the show, she can make it easier for more female students to come to the Women's Clinic to get yearly checkups, which are important to start at age 18.

"Most have a fear of the unknown," Blank said. "They have never had it before and have heard tales from other people. They are just afraid because they don't know."

Blank said she enjoys her work at Lafene, and said the radio program will be fun for her while helping the campus community at the same time.

"This is a great place to work," Blank said. "I was welcomed instantly into this family, which is why I am here and not somewhere else."

Dartmouth greek changes spur student protest

About 1,000 students protest decision to make fraternities, sororities coed.

By KATHARINE WEBSTER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HANOVER, N.H. — Dartmouth College's decision to push for an end to single-sex fraternities and sororities has angered students at the Ivy League school and prompted the cancellation of all significant fraternity-sponsored parties on campus for the semester.

The Coed Fraternity Sorority Council's decision Wednesday includes the 21 events meant to coincide with this weekend's Winter Carnival, including the "keg jump," an ice-skating event that was an 18-year tradition.

Andy Louis, student co-chairman of the Winter Carnival Council, said Thursday that college-sponsored events would go on as planned.

Jamie Paul, member of the Coed Fraternity Sorority Council, said the cancellations were intended to show that without greek life there's simply nothing to do at Dartmouth.

"The greek system is a very huge thing up here," said Brad Bingham, 22, a member of Alpha Delta from Patoka, Ind. "If there was a city or a bigger town with more things to do, maybe it wouldn't be so important."

Dartmouth, founded in 1769, has had fraternities for more than 150 years.

They are a large part of the school's image and students' social lives in Hanover, a town of about 9,000 near the Vermont state line.

Chris Miller, a member of Alpha Delta when he was a Dartmouth student, co-wrote "Animal House," the 1978 film comedy about fraternity-house debauchery.

In a letter to students this week, officials announced plans to phase out the current greek system to make college life "substantially coed" and to encourage "respectful relations between women and men."

College administrators said they are concerned about problem drinking and the exclusive nature of the greek system. Officials at the Ivy League school refused to say whether the plan means just requiring residential fraternities and sororities to go coed or phasing them out altogether but said the changes could come as soon as next fall.

Administrators said they are seeking student suggestions, but many students were angry the college did not ask their opinions before announcing the change.

"Every time they plant a tree or modify the curriculum, they constantly have student meetings and discussions," said Catherine Curran, a 19-year-old sophomore from Las Vegas. "For something this drastic, they should have gotten student input."

A group of students, estimated at about 1,000 by The Dartmouth, the student newspaper, protested outside Dartmouth president James Wright's home Wednesday night.

According to the student newspaper, more than 35 percent of the 4,300 undergraduates are members of 25 single-sex fraternities and sororities.

"What we get out of it is the friends we form by being in a bonding environment with the same 20-30 guys for years and years," said Timothy Naples, 20, a member of Alpha Chi Alpha from Garden City, N.Y. "No coed house or other mandatory program from the school can do that."

Unabomber will publish manuscript

By FRANK ELTMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Unabomber Theodore J. Kaczynski has landed a book deal to tell his story and will give the proceeds to his victims' families, a publisher said Thursday.

"Truth Versus Lies" will be "an attempt to tell the other side of a one-sided tale that was spun by his family and his attorneys in their attempt to save him from the death penalty," Beau Friedlander, publisher of Context Media, said.

Kaczynski is serving a life sentence for 16 bomb attacks that killed three people and wounded 29.

He pleaded guilty last year in Sacramento, Calif., to avoid the death penalty.

As part of that deal, he also agreed to turn over any future earnings to the victims' families.

After Kaczynski tried unsuccessfully last year to pitch a book to more established New York publishers, including Simon & Schuster, Friedlander wrote to the former mathematics professor in prison and expressed interest in publishing the book.

He said he received a 548-page manuscript from Kaczynski last fall and plans to publish the book in late May or June.

The publisher declined to release an advance copy, saying he still is shopping around for possible serialization by a magazine or newspaper.

Kaczynski previously wrote a 35,000-word anti-technology manifesto that was published by The Washington Post and The New York Times in 1995. His brother, David, noticed similarities to Kaczynski's writings and turned him in.

David Kaczynski got a $1 million government reward and has set up a fund to distribute about $500,000 to victims of crimes committed by people who are paranoid schizophrenics like his brother.

true motivations for turning him over to the FBI. Kaczynski spares no details, even when they show him in a less-than-favorable light."

Context Media also is releasing a book this spring by Michael Mello, a Vermont law professor who has exchanged letters with Kaczynski since July.

Kaczynski believes he was unfairly coerced into pleading guilty and has hired a new lawyer to help him win a second trial, Mello said.

SGA 1999 ELECTIONS

Requirements undergraduates to run for office

Undergraduate candidates must run in the college of their primary major, be enrolled in 12 hours and have at least a 2.0 cumulative grade point average.

Graduate students must be enrolled in 6 credit hours and have a 3.0 cumulative GPA.

Seats are also available for the Board of Student Publications, Union Governing Board, Fine Arts Council and individual college councils.

WHO'S IN SENATE

60 Senate seats up for grabs
Senate is made up of 60 voting positions, two faculty members, standing committees and student interns.

Several colleges short on candidates in last year's election

Six colleges did not have as many candidates file for elections as available seats, but many write-in candidates did take seats in Senate.

College	Candidates/Seats
Agriculture	4/6
Arts & Sciences	15/18
Architecture	2/2
Business	12/8

Filing period for elections ends Friday

Student Senate chair hopes to see increase in number of students filing.

By CAIT PURINTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students might not realize it, but general elections for Student Senate and Student Governing Association are approaching and it is not too late to run for a seat in Senate.

The filing deadline for elections is 4 p.m. Friday in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Student Senate Chair Gabe Eckert said he thinks more people will run because SGA has been effective this year. He said its effectiveness in tackling issues that affect students will encourage more people to run and will bring more people to the polls to vote.

"I'm optimistic this year that we'll have more people run," Eckert said.

The Elections Committee is working with the Communications Committee this year to encourage more students to run for positions. Elections Committee Chair Joe Ashley said committee members plan to advertise on campus and visit living organizations and residence halls to get the word out.

"I hope senators have been talking about it and getting information to people interested," Ashley said.

Students do not need any prior experience to run and should plan to be at K-State for their full term.

"Some of our best senators come in without knowledge of how Student Senate works," Eckert said.

He said this allows them to come into Senate with a fresh mind.

Last year, there were more positions available than people running in some colleges. When there are not enough people to fill seats, the college's council appoints senators.

Eckert said when Senate is not full, it does not affect how it serves the students, but not as many voices are heard.

"Students obviously have a strong voice when seats are filled," he said.

WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW

See the informational graphic running down the left side of this page for all vital info on SGA elections.

Eckert said senators serve as an official voice of students and deal with campus issues, including safety, improving higher education at K-State and in Kansas, and making recommendations for privilege fee specifications.

They also attend Thursday evening meetings, which last two to three hours on average. Each senator is on a standing committee, which meets each week for one to two hours.

Eckert said a good senator spends their own time going over issues and 400 area collectors meet to buy, trade and sell one of America's hottest toys

BEANIE BABY BLITZ

Shoppers look at the display of Beanie Babies belonging to Tony and Brenda George, of Pretty Prairie, Kan., Saturday morning at Pottorf Hall in CCo Park. About 400 collectors attended the event.

K-State collectors among many who flock to Pottorf Hall for Beanie Baby show

Co Park's Pottorf Hall was the gathering place for Beanie Baby fanatics Saturday, when about 400 collectors from the Manhattan area bought, sold and traded portions of their collections.

Enn Moore, freshman in journalism and mass communications, and Stephanie Ross, freshman in Spanish and pre-nursing, have been collecting Beanie Babies since McDonald's offered the first set of the miniature replicas.

"We accidentally found them at a high school swim trip," Moore said.

"We were in Wichita and got Happy Meals just because we liked the toys."

The two women had no idea how valuable the entire set would later be worth. Moore said the toys came right out of their bags so they could be tossed around on the trip home.

"My brothers went ballistic when I got home and they had to get the rest of the set," Moore said.

Ross and Moore also made sure they got eight other items to complete the first phase of miniatures.

"We ate McDonald's all the time;

breakfast, lunch and dinner," Ross said. "We checked all the time to see if the new ones had come out for the week."

Since the first set, McDonald's has released a follow-up collection of 10 different miniature Ty collectibles that Ross and Moore made sure to get.

Now, the two have branched off in different directions with their individual collections. Moore works at building to her collection of cats as new ones are issued to the different gift shops around Manhattan.

"I check back every once in awhile, but I have a friend who calls me if one comes in that she thinks I don't have," Moore said.

Ross focuses on adding to her collection with the release of new dog characters, along with picking up bird or bear babies she likes.

The two were a couple of the last buyers, traders and sellers at Saturday's Beanie Baby Bonanza. They were not looking for anything in particular, but thought they could find something that had not made it to local store shelves.

"You never know when to buy them," Ross said. "We come to these shows to buy the old ones we know we are going to pay a lot for."

Ross walked away from the show with a Spot dog in trade for one of her doubles and a little bit of cash. Moore added just one cat, "Stripes," to her collection.

"These shows are a good chance for some of us who don't have a lot to get some of the new ones," Moore said.

Clinton acquitted on both charges; senators denied vote on censure

By TERENCE HUNT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CLINTON

WASHINGTON, D.C. — There were no heroes, only survivors, as two somber roll-call votes brought a dignified end to an unseemly chapter of America's political history. At the final gavel, there was relief on Capitol Hill, humility at the White House and mercy for Americans who tired of the rancor long ago.

After a strange year of political soap opera, constitutional crises and savage politics, Washington already was taking stock, debating the consequences of the impeachment battle and jockeying for the future.

"I don't think anybody comes out of this looking good," Columbia University historian Alan Brinkley said. "The president, the independent counsel, the courts, the press, and now the Congress — everyone has looked bad, everyone has behaved badly, and everyone has lost respect."

President Clinton was spared dismissal but stained in history. His House prosecutors went away angry at the Senate that acquitted him. Democrats and Republicans who wanted to censure the president for his

Union fee bill sent to Senate

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A unanimous vote by the Privilege Fee Committee on Sunday will send a bill to the Student Senate floor that would allocate $60,696 to the K-State Student Union for technology enhancement.

Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, said the emergency allocation request has been reduced to the lowest amount possible and waiting to fill the request could mean a larger privilege fee request in the future.

"If we don't get it resolved now, the price tag after Jan. 1, 2000, will be phenomenal," Pitts said.

If granted, the money will be taken from a reserve account designated for emergency purposes.

Also discussed Sunday was an emergency allocation request to KSDB-FM 91.9 for $42,783. The original amount was presented to Senate on Thursday and was referred back to the committee.

The committee amended the request to $29,825, subtracting $12,958 that came from the KSU Foundation underwriting accounts, due to concerns from privilege fee members that the full request would fail if brought before Senate again.

The original deficit was incurred from overspending on Springfest '98.

Proposal would redistribute allotment of ICAT tickets

A proposal to allocate ICAT seating space has been submitted to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and ticket office and should be approved soon, Michelle Murphy, president of ICAT, said.

The proposal involved gathering support for football ICAT and basketball ICAT.

"The premise behind ICAT is to support all sports," said Murphy, senior in marketing and international business.

In the proposed new system, half of the available ICAT seats would be given to combo ticket holders and half to football-only ticket holders.

If the proposal is approved, students would be able to purchase ICAT passes while enrolling in classes.

The exact number of seats is not yet known because of the stadium expansion, said Missy Decker, assistant director of marketing and promotions.

"It was a unanimous decision to submit the proposal to the board," Decker said. "I think it will really work."

Clinton gives plan for U.S. involvement in Kosovo

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As many as 4,000 American troops will go to Kosovo as part of a 28,000-strong NATO peacekeeping force if warring Serbs and ethnic Albanians reach a political settlement, President Clinton said Saturday.

Clinton said that without a U.S. commitment, the warfare could bleed beyond Kosovo's borders — into Albania, Macedonia, Greece and Turkey, and even re-ignite conflict in Bosnia.

"America cannot be everywhere or do everything overseas, but we must act where important interests are at stake and we can make a difference," Clinton said in his weekly radio broadcast to the nation.

In Rambouillet, France, site of the talks, Serb negotiators were reported awaiting instructions from President Slobodan Milosevic on whether to discuss seriously a U.S.-sponsored plan for Kosovo or stick to their hard-line position and face NATO strikes.

"We could be in a position where we have to take military action if the Serbs ... don't agree to a settlement," National Security Council spokesman David Leavy said Saturday.

Threats of NATO military strikes so far have only slowed the violence, and the diplomatic talks still face serious obstacles, Clinton said.

"It is increasingly clear that this effort can only succeed if it includes a NATO-led peace implementation force that gives both sides the confidence to lay down their arms," he said. "It's also clear that if there is real peace, American participation in the force can provide such confidence, particularly for Kosovo's Albanians."

A vanguard of U.S. Marines could enter the Serbian province within 10 days of a peace agreement, a senior U.S. defense official said.

The Americans would be part of a multinational force, with U.S. Gen. Wesley Clarke, NATO's commander in Europe, at the top of the chain of command.

Iraq says it has ability to attack U.S., British bases

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government said Sunday it could attack American and British bases in the Persian Gulf that are used to launch air strikes against Iraq.

"We, by help from God and support from the sons of our glorious Arab nation, including true and sincere nationals ... in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, have the ability to attack the soldiers and means of aggression from whatever region," Iraqi television said, quoting a statement from President Saddam Hussein and senior leaders.

The statement came amid a simmering war of nerves with the United States and Britain over "no-fly" zones imposed in northern and southern Iraq. Iraq has vowed to fire at any plane that violates its airspace.

The United States has accused Iraq of more than 90 violations of the no-fly zones since mid-December. It said U.S. and British forces have retaliated by attacking more than 40 Iraqi targets.

The Iraqi statement was issued following a meeting Hussein held with three senior aides. It again warned Saudi Arabia and Kuwait to distance themselves from the United States.

70 parking spaces lost in Anderson expansion

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 70 parking places were lost temporarily when construction workers blocked off a section of the parking lot south of the K-State Student Union, Darwin Abbott, Director of Parking Services, said recently.

Jerry Petty, Manhattan director of public works, said the temporary reduction of parking is necessary as part of the Anderson Avenue expansion project.

"The lot is being blocked off because it is going to be torn up," Petty said. "The construction workers are starting to install the big storm sewer that will run parallel to Anderson Avenue."

The storm sewer is part of the first phase of the Anderson expansion project, which will connect the newly installed concrete storm box by Nichols Hall with an existing storm drainage box along Memorial Stadium.

"OBVIOUSLY, K-STATE TRAFFIC AND PARKING WILL BE AFFECTED, AND WE WILL HAVE TO FIND A WAY TO WORK AROUND IT."

— DARWIN ABBOTT
DIRECTOR OF PARKING SERVICES

Phases two, three and four of the project, which include installing a storm sewer along the opposite side of the street, reconstructing the intersection of Anderson and Sunset avenues, and overlaying the entire width of Anderson, should be finished by Nov. 20, Petty said.

He said the parking lot will be blocked off until the end of March and possibly longer, depending on weather conditions.

Replacement parking will be limited during the next few months, Abbott said.

"We have limited parking resources right now," he said. "There is increased parking in the D5 lot at Marlatt Hall, but the construction at Fiedler Hall took some parking places, too. Some people used to parking on campus may have a hard time finding a place to park."

Signs were posted at the entrances and exits of the Union parking lot on the Thursday and Friday before construction began to give students time to find an alternate place to park.

The best thing to do during the construction is to plan ahead, Abbott said.

"Hopefully, people will car pool, walk or bike to campus as long as the weather is nice," he said.

Parking Services is meeting with Manhattan Public Works to plan parking and traffic alternatives for road closings because of the project, Abbott said.

He said the parking situation is necessary for now, but Parking Services is doing the best it can to accommodate students until the Anderson project is complete.

"We meet with them because they will have to close College Avenue, 17th Street and Denison Avenue at times during the construction," Abbott said. "Obviously, K-State traffic and parking will be affected, and we will have to find a way to work around it."

Minors seeking abortions would need parental consent under proposal

By DAVID MILES
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

TOPEKA — A House committee will consider a bill this week that would require a minor to obtain parental consent in order to get an abortion.

Meanwhile, the House Taxation Committee will discuss a plan to cut taxes by $800 million over five years.

Today and Tuesday, the House Federal and State Affairs Committee will take up a bill requiring any female younger than 18 wanting to have an abortion to get written consent from at least one parent.

Under current state law, a minor's physician must notify at least one parent before performing an abortion, but parental consent is not required. The bill would repeal the section of law on parental notification and replace it with the new language on consent.

Federal and State Affairs Committee Chairwoman Susan Wagle said she supports the concept of requiring parental approval.

"I think that government should encourage family involvement," Wagle, R-Wichita, said. "Abortion is a major medical procedure. I would never want my daughter going through that by herself."

The bill would allow a district court judge to authorize an abortion without parental consent. A similar exemption on parental notification exists in the current law.

The bill also would permit abortions without parental consent when the procedure is necessary to save the girl's life and there is not enough time to obtain consent. Minors who are married or not under parental custody would be exempt from the consent requirement as well.

Some legislators object to the greater restrictions the bill would place on minors seeking abortions.

"I oppose having a parent who is the rapist prohibiting their very young daughter from having access," Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said. "There's something wrong with that, in my mind."

Wagle said the provision allowing judges to permit abortions would alleviate that problem.

"She can go tell a judge that, for some hardship reason, she cannot tell her parents," Wagle said. "A judge can take the place of a parent and say, 'OK, you're allowed to have an abortion.'"

Wagle said she thinks the bill could easily pass the House, but could run into trouble in the Senate.

Bond said the Senate probably would pass a bill requiring parental consent if it made it to the Senate floor, but it might not make it out of committee.

The Senate Judiciary Committee likely would consider a Senate bill on parental consent before it would go to the full chamber.

Senate Majority Leader Tim Emert, who is the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said he believes the Senate would not approve a parental consent bill and that many legislators do not want to address the thorny issue of abortion at all.

"I don't find a lot of enthusiasm to do anything in the line of abortion," Emert, R-Independence, said. "I've just talked to a number of people who think we ought to just let things remain as they are."

Mike Matson, Gov. Bill Graves' spokesman, declined to comment on the issue.

Also this week, the House is expected to consider a substantial tax cut. House Taxation Chairman David Adkins said he expects his committee to vote on a tax relief bill — perhaps as early as Tuesday — that will include many of the tax breaks Graves and others have proposed. It could be debated by the House late in the week.

"It will be multifaceted and very large," Adkins, R-Leawood, said. "It's going to be everything to everybody."

Adkins said he expects the committee to consider scaling down the 4.9-percent sales tax on food to 0.9 percent and look at Graves' proposals to phase out the property tax on motor vehicles and repeal the oil severance tax.

Other parts of the plan push the total cost to $800 million over five years.

That kind of tax reduction probably would jeopardize any chance of passing a large transportation program.

State should be wary of continued tax cuts

The economy is good, the job market is strong and Kansans are living about as comfortably as they ever have.

The windfall from a positive economic climate once again has created a surplus in Kansas' legislative coffers, which is why legislators and Gov. Bill Graves are trying to find a way to lower taxes.

Legislators see tax cuts as a requirement for making the public happy, a philosophy that likely stems from the conservative attitude of Kansas politicians. Four years ago, public outcry at a high Kansas tax rate resulted in immediate reduction of state taxes. The Legislature has cut taxes every year since that time.

The air in Topeka is clouded with talk of a comprehensive highway program. Though revenues are good, Graves and some legislators want to fund the program with long-term bonds instead of a slightly smaller, safer, pay-as-you-go alternative. In addition to funding a highway plan, for which the cost is in the billions, legislators still insist that a tax cut is possible this session.

They'll promise to fund other programs, too, such as K-12 education, higher education and a foster care system that is struggling after its privatization.

It appears as though the Legislature is motivated by the belief that the economy will remain strong indefinitely. If Kansas was to see a bad year agriculturally, government officials could find themselves looking for the sources of income that they now are trying to eliminate. Likewise, if the economic climate were to turn sour over the course of the next few years, legislators would be required to overturn the tax-reduction decisions they are considering.

We should be making an effort to address suffering programs while we have the opportunity. If we're living in such good times, the Legislature should make a commitment to getting essential state programs out of the red.

If there were a year to go without a tax cut, this would be it. Legislators are not in an election year, and the political pressure to return money to the public has been doused. Kansas residents are beginning to see how poorly funded their programs are.

Legislators can't have it both ways. They can't build roads and schools while pocketing a bundle of tax rebates to take home to constituents. While a tax cut would be nice, the priority should be on adequately funding institutions that can provide so much for so many Kansans.

K-State is never going to have a respectable basketball team until we lose Tom Asbury and his losing ideology.

I thoroughly enjoyed Sam Sackett's Wednesday column. It is very insightful. Thank you, Sam.

When three of the five Academy Award-nominated films for best picture aren't even showing in Manhattan, it reminds me that I'm still stuck in the middle of Kansas.

If it had been the photography club that had been the primary opposition to the format change at DB92, no one would have accused detractors of being anti-pictures.

THE DAY AFTER

TODD PETERSEN/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Repairing wounds of valentines gone wrong

VIEWPOINT

WELLS

It's President's Day. It's the day before Mardi Gras, the day before the full moon. It's also the day after Valentine's Day.

You're going to have a distinct reaction to this information based on how you spent the holiday. Perhaps it was blissful coexistence with your mate, sipping Chardonnay by the fireplace and listening to Mozart while whispering snippets of Shelley into each other's ears. Better still, maybe you stared at the telephone for nine hours, hoping you could will it to ring; maybe you picked it up a few times, heard the dial tone, made sure it was still working.

Or, my personal favorite, maybe it was time spent with your special someone, time that went hideously, unforgivably wrong.

Perhaps her favorite kitten managed to slink inside her sweater before you threw it into the washer. Or maybe she accidentally copied over your tape of the 1996 Chargers-Chiefs Monday Night Football game with a riveting two-part episode of "Dr. Quinn, Medicine Woman." Maybe her stroganoff gave you botulism. Maybe he ran over your Walkman with the lawn mower. Maybe you got your tongue piercing hooked on her nose piercing and dialed 911 and it took you several minutes to get the operator to believe you (and then to take you seriously).

Days spent alone on Valentine's Day can't really go wrong to the same extremes that days spent together can. And if your day involved saying something like "But Muffin, I didn't realize your mother drove a truck," perhaps you need some spiritual Bactine to smooth away the sore part of your karma.

First, try to heal (or at least stitch) the wounds of the offending day. If you turned Fifi into compost with a bad swipe of the weed whacker, maybe you should get a replacement. I don't mean an identical animal (unless your partner hasn't noticed Fifi's corpse yet, in which case it bears serious consideration), but something which fulfills the same function as the deceased, dismembered or dislocated item. Pets replace pets. Maybe plants and pets can substitute for each other; depends on how open-minded the offended party is. (Hint: plants are cheaper.) Consider stealing a neighbor's pet. Wear gloves, as it might have teeth.

If a valuable item was destroyed, consider finding something expensive. Don't ask why things are expensive; they just are, and your partner can sniff out the differences even if a team of archaeologists armed with electron microscopes can't. Flowers are nice, but they die; if you're in the doghouse, you need something that's gonna stick around for at least as long as you want to. Hopefully your shelf life is better than the tulips you yanked out of the elderly neighbors' lawn while their backs were turned.

It's hard to replace sentimental items, though. Nothing out of the store is going to have the same value as the Larry Bird rookie jersey, and nothing's going to quickly erase the trauma of watching it get chewed down the garbage disposal. Sometimes healing room is called for; sometimes distance is best.

You need to know when your partner needs you and when your partner needs to be alone, and that can be worth all the gold in the world. If your partner offers you money to leave them alone, take it and go to a movie. Take a friend of the opposite sex. They like that.

Sometimes your partner will be the one in the doghouse, and it's up to you to be comforting in this time of need. It always helps to have another pair of hands in the house, so invite your mother over for a spell. She'll love to give your partner specific criticism and helpful advice on how to make the relationship work better. Your partner will thank you for it. Hide all sharp objects for the duration of your mother's visit.

The summit of the romantic season has blown through, and now you're staring down 365 days of mediocrity before the Cupid-and-hearts combos bubble back to the surface of our cultural consciousness. You might think that it's a strain to keep such romantic concepts at the forefront of your true love's mind, but the saturation of the last few weeks has implanted it there to stay. Any attempt to reinforce your affection as the year passes would be wasted time. Take it for granted that they know exactly how you feel, and spend your time on your hobbies, like waxing your car, sewing and collecting alcoholic beverage containers. Move on to Mardi Gras.

Save your money for next Valentine's Day. You'll need it.

Could someone please take out Hale Library's trash?

VIEWPOINT

VANLEEUVEN

It's a story that has become familiar here at K-State in the last two years. It's the story of "Who Should Take Out the Trash at Hale Library."

While no one can decide whose job it is — the university's or the students', it's obvious something needs to be done, because this issue is stinking up the academic integrity of the university.

And now, for your reading pleasure, it's the story we've all grown to hate:

There once was a library with nothing in it but plush couches, potted plants, some books and journals, and tons of sleepy students.

This library belongs to a competitive school that likes to win, and one day a few years back someone realized that we were in last place. Last! Oh my goodness! We were $4 million behind the second-to-last loser. With $4 million, the average student could buy about 16 million packages of ramen noodles.

The library said, "We can't be last! Our building is so pretty." Everyone realized that too much money was spent on making the library aesthetically pleasing and comfortable to students who use it for napping, rather than making it the best library — or at least not the worst.

"What are we going to do?" everyone shouted. "Let's get money to build an addition to our football stadium," Max Urlick replied.

Some professors thought, "How are we going to do research with these pithy journal subscriptions? How are we going to be able to educate students properly without cutting-edge information? How am I going to get published with no evidence to back up my claims? How am I going to get tenure? Should I go to another school where my research and teaching is put first? Yeah, let those students fend for themselves with someone else to teach them."

Some students said, "What are we going to do? Why did I come to a university that has obviously let its library slip through the cracks in the race for academic excellence? Isn't the library an important part of a university? Other universities put money into their libraries. They value the quality of education. Other students put more money into their libraries. Texas A&M students pay a library usage fee of $4 per credit hour."

So, the university scurried around looking for money and asked nicely, in the spirit of compromise and goodwill toward all students, faculty and staff, if students could pay a small amount of money per credit hour to bring the library from the pits of despair.

This is where the story comes to a halt. The argument began two years ago and continues to this

JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cathy White, now a senior in social work, looks at periodicals in Farrell Library in October 1997. Debate about how to solve the library's funding shortage has included the idea that students pay a privilege fee to fund resource acquisition.

day. The reason the issue hasn't been solved is that it's come down to an argument between the university and the students.

Should it be paid completely by the university, the providers of education and academic excellence, the ones who supposedly are dedicated to the educational quality of the university?

Perhaps the students should contribute a bit of dough to the pie from which they all directly or indirectly eat. Upon mentioning this, students start bickering amongst themselves, making the overall noise stemming from this issue unbearable and well beyond sound-pollution limits. Some students ignorantly don't see the pivotal role that a library plays in the overall status and quality of a university, and they claim that the library doesn't affect their quality of education. Other students see the value in a library, whether they use it or not, and see that it is in dire need of funds. However, these students do not think that having a quality library is a privilege, it is a right not only to the students of K-State but also to the professors and the university.

To pay or not to pay, that is the question. Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer from a terrible library and leave it to an administration determined to not shell out the dough for something that we deserve, or to take up $15 from every student per semester to get us out of this sea of trouble and to end our dastardly ranking.

Two years, people! Let's end this.

Administration, please end this twisted fairy tale, or if you must play the role of big, bad wolf, then Little Purple Riding Hood students, keep in mind that $15 a semester is worth it to improve our quality of education. I don't care whose turn it is to take out the garbage, someone should just take it out, and replace our scrappy library with a brand spankin' new one with actual books and information in it.

READERS write

Letter-writer, Collegian exaggerate bike problem

Editor,

What bicycle-pedestrian problem? Ninety-nine percent of it at minimum is a combination of police mentality, Phil Anderson and successive generations of power-tripping student résumé-builders needing to get a life, and Collegian writers flogging this politically correct topic when they couldn't think of anything else to say.

What bicycle-pedestrian accidents? I'm not talking about unfortunate incidents when "a silent machine creeps up behind," to quote one letter in years past. Spare us! Anyone who expects the university to protect them from things no scarier than that has some nasty surprises waiting in the real world.

Let's assume there actually is an occasional (documented) contact accident, maybe even one every few years requiring some medical attention. Still, we've spent and apparently will continue to spend more on this almost entirely manufactured crisis than on the genuinely serious problem of crosswalks, for example.

Forget my bike. I wish my truck was worth what the campus police have laid out just to hire and equip their so-called bicycle patrol.

This is just the old story of needing to suck up ever-increasing grants and appropriations to justify your existence.

Having recently had someone stroll across the street in front of me at night wearing what might as well have been a ninja outfit — in absolute trust I was going to stop, or even see him — I appreciate the lip service that's paid to the idea of pedestrians having some small responsibility in the matter.

Can you say "Darwin?" When it's you (or me) vs. semi-serious iron, we ought to at least know what the term implies. But pedestrians and bicycles? Well, I do suppose most of us on both sides of the handlebars would rather avoid bumps and bruises — even genuine close calls — however uncommon.

Or maybe "rare" is the word I'm looking for to describe the situation as it stands and as it has stood over the years when Anderson, the Collegian and company were blowing it up into the Next Big Thing.

Radio station staffer says Simon was pressured

Editor,

I am writing in regards to the front-page article on Feb. 9 titled "Simon says he wasn't forced to change station's schedule." As the news and public affairs director of KSDB-FM 91.9, I have been involved in this whole ordeal, and I can attest to instances where Todd Simon, as well as the KSDB Executive Board, were lobbied by members of Black Student Union and Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost for multicultural affairs.

I cannot attest to things that I was not present to witness, but in talking to Jeremy Claeys, program director of KSDB, and others, this situation started even before the Wildcat 91.9 went on the air Jan. 15. Claeys received word through Simon that both the Office of Multicultural Affairs and BSU had contacted him about the programming changes for urban music. A series of three KSDB Executive Board meetings ensued, turning out a spirit of compromise and goodwill with the board and members of BSU.

Someone wasn't happy, though. Either through pressuring from disgruntled, former KSDB staff and/or the Office of Multicultural Affairs, the members of BSU continued to lobby for another time slot for urban programming. On Jan. 26, Claeys and I sat down with Taylor-Archer to discuss the matter. After Claeys and I presented a sincere explanation of the programming changes, Taylor-Archer proceeded to lecture us for 45 minutes about her involvement with African-American movements throughout her career.

Taylor-Archer is a well-respected member of the university administration, and to stoop to threats should be beneath her. Her references to the African-American community during her lecture made Claeys and myself feel we were being called "racists" for our programming decisions.

After this experience, I was ready to drop the whole thing. I wanted to concentrate on my news department, which is still behind schedule. But when I saw Simon's statements on Tuesday claiming there was never any pressure, I had to act. Past Collegian articles document the involvement of BSU and the Office of Multicultural Affairs in this matter. Members of the KSDB executive staff have been contacted repeatedly by these people. To claim there was never such involvement is a lie and an insult to everyone involved. The programming decision Simon clearly was made under extreme pressure. Simon might be a leader in the eyes of Taylor-Archer, but he has failed in the eyes of this journalism student.

Greek Affairs 'trying to do the right thing' with hazing

Editor,

I am writing in reference to the editorial in Thursday's edition of the Collegian. The editorial made several statements I felt were unfounded and completely biased.

Your editorial states, "Hazing should be punished, and greek houses should have to rebuild after committing such an offense." I agree with your assessment; however, I question your motives. As I see it, the problem was handled in a professional, equitable manner by the parties involved. The greek system long has observed actions by the Collegian to discredit its policies and procedures. Perhaps if you, as I have, had visited with Barb Robel and the members of the Panhellenic Council before ostracizing them for a "cover up," you would have found a sincere group of people who are trying to do the right thing.

I, for one, believe we have an obligation to help each other out. If the members of Delta Delta Delta are willing to admit fault, which I believe they have done, we, as a college community, should be willing to forgive. However, instead of exercising what power your medium has to be constructive, you have engaged in a weak-willed, public flogging of a group that has made a mistake.

I don't want the last comment to be misconstrued. The seriousness of the issue is not debatable. And your implication that the greek community does not take hazing seriously is an ignorant one. Did you know that K-State was one of the first universities to take a proactive stance on hazing? Did you also know that our joint Interfraternity/Panhellenic Council Anti-Hazing policy is looked to as one of the benchmarks in the fraternal world?

In the future, I hope that before formulating an opinion, you research your subject. Also, I believe the college paper should responsibly reflect the campus, which is definitely one of a caring, supportive community.

Tri-Delt sanctions indicate problems in greek system

Editor,

I have just finished reading the article concerning the Delta Delta Delta hazing violations, and I had a few comments to make concerning the punishments handed down by the national organization to the Tri-Delt chapter.

What is the "discuss standards of excellence" punishment doing? Every student organization probably discusses this every year; if they don't, they should. Having the collegiate district officer visit the chapter is a punishment? Doing a program about hazing and alcohol awareness is a punishment? In the organizations where we did these sort of things, these would be called educational programs, and it would happen anyway. Oh, maybe the punishment is having to take minutes. Is the punishment of submitting their plans for Bid Day to the national office the price of postage? If this "Obligations of Membership and Statement of Financial Obligation" is so important to preventing hazing, this paper should be signed every year by everyone anyway.

Now we see the "real punishments." Two social events per month, both alcohol-free. Basically, what we're saying is "you can have only 16 parties this academic year, and they have to be alcohol free." As much as the greek system tries to shy away from the "we're only a social group" moniker that society has "so unfairly" placed on them, it comes down to the simple fact that for the K-State greek system to enforce its "no tolerance for hazing" policies, it has to limit the number of social gatherings a chapter can have per month, not per semester or per year, to even cause its members to think about the problem. I guess this incident of hazing wasn't serious enough to warrant serious punishment. Let me give you a clue that everyone else already knows: every incident is serious enough. If being able to have only two social gatherings per month is the only real punishment for hazing, then this system is in a sad state of disrepair.

Lack of parking spaces frustrates Ogden student

I am a non-traditional student, a single mother of two teen-agers, living in Ogden. In order to ensure that I get a parking spot on campus, I have to arrive at K-State no later than 7:30 a.m. This isn't so bad on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays because my first class is at 9:30, but on Tuesdays and Thursdays my first class is at 12:30 p.m. This makes for a very long day.

Unfortunately, I was late on the day in question and spent the better part of two hours looking for a parking space — finally finding one in the metered lot at the K-State Student Union — which cost me an extra $3.25 on top of the $35 I already had spent at the beginning of the semester in buying a parking permit.

I noticed as I scrambled from lot to lot looking for that prized space that numerous parking spaces had or will fall victim to the road expansion on Anderson Avenue. What's being done to replace these spaces being dug up? It's not like the parking situation hasn't been an ongoing problem at K-State for the past few years — and, I might add, is getting worse each consecutive year. Just what, if anything, is being done? From what I can see, nothing but a load of smooth talking has taken place.

Not only did I see spaces being torn away, but in another lot spaces were being roped off, prohibiting students from parking. I assume this was for visitors or participants of some conference. Why? I must have seen 50 or more spaces permanently or temporarily out of commission. That's 50 or more frustrated students who can't find a place to park. If you have to block off spaces for visitors, use the metered lots. This makes sense to me. Of course, this would interfere with the precious flow of revenue and I'm sure someone won't like it, but at least students will have a place to park that won't cost them more than they already have spent.

Something needs to be done about the situation and soon. I already have witnessed arguments and scuffles over parking spaces and can predict that it will get worse as tempers flare when one becomes frustrated.

If the administration does not address this issue and address it properly, pandemonium will ensue.

Former All-American to leave K-State after 30 years

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wallace Kidd found it difficult to articulate how he felt about retiring his long-time friend administrator Veryl Switzer.

"It'd take all week to try to describe him, but a direct answer to your question is, he's one heck of a guy," he said.

The former Wildcat football and track athlete will retire from his position as assistant to the director for departmental relations at the conclusion of this year, bringing to a close more than 30 years of service to the university.

President Jon Wefald has declared today "Veryl Switzer Day," on the K-State campus, kicking off a week's worth of activities in honor of the departing administrator.

"He's an ambassador for K-State, and he represents K-State at its best," Wefald said.

"He's honest, he's dedicated, and I think everyone who runs into Veryl Switzer realizes the great affection he has for Kansas State University."

Athletic Director Max Urlick said even a week's worth of activities is barely enough to pay tribute to Switzer.

"It will take a whole week to allow for all the people whose lives Veryl has touched to pay tribute to him," Urlick said.

Known today for his involvement with campus and civic groups, Switzer first made his mark on K-State as a student athlete in the early 1950s.

"I wish we had film that they could see, because I don't think people really understand how outstanding he was and the plays that he made," said Dick Towers, a former teammate and long-time friend of Switzer.

The Nicodemus, Kan., native was seen as a rising star from the moment he arrived on campus.

"Everyone knew that Veryl was going to be something special. They looked up to him and he wasn't disappointing," Towers said.

"I would have to say that he's one of the better players to have ever played here," said Director of Development

Ernie Barrett, who has seen a range of talent in his 60 years of involvement with Wildcat athletics.

"Mr. Perpetual Motion," as he came to be known, began making his name as a hard-hitting safety in his sophomore season. Switzer, who also led the team in punt returns, was named as a second-team All-America defensive back.

"He was a vicious hitter," Towers said. "Wherever the ball was, Veryl was going to be there. You just didn't want to run in his area."

"One of the things which made me successful was the limited number of players in 6-man (high school) football versus 11," Switzer said. "You had a lot of open space out there, and you had to be able to make the plays one-on-one."

Switzer became a 60-minute man in his junior year, doubling as a running back in addition to his usual duties as a safety and return man.

His senior year was marked by a number of Wildcat football landmarks.

In his final campaign in a K-State uniform, Switzer led the Wildcats in rushing, receiving and scoring, and led the nation in punt returns with a 31-yard average. Further, he once again gained All-American recognition as a defensive back, this time on the first team.

"He was an outstanding role model, and everyone wanted to see him play because he was a very exciting runner," Barrett said.

"If he had just been a back and had never played defense, he would have been an All-American there, too," Towers said.

Switzer led the Wildcats, who had five consecutive last-place finishes in the Big 7 Conference and had won only one game in Switzer's first two seasons, to a 6-3-1 record and a second-place finish in the conference.

"I felt great about that," Switzer said. "It meant a lot not just to the players, but to the fans and the students as well."

As the fourth overall pick in the 1953 NFL Draft by the Green Bay Packers, Switzer holds the highest draft position ever by a K-State player. His status as the school's leader in career punt returns stood for more than 40 years, prior to David Allen surpassing him last season.

Though his records might fall, head football coach Bill Snyder said Switzer's place in Wildcat history remains secure.

"He's a great, great K-State person and he'll always be that," Snyder said. "I think everyone who has encountered him will always hold him in high respect."

BAYLOR BASH

Cats defeat struggling Bears, 77-68

BY FRANK FLATON

"WE ARE GOING TO MAKE SURE WE FINISH OUT RIGHT."

— SHAWN RHODES

Baylor came into Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday searching for its first Big 12 Conference victory against the K-State men's basketball team. As the Wildcats threw the ball away 15 times and the Bears hit several clutch three-pointers, Baylor almost did just that.

Instead, K-State, 6-9 overall and 5-7 in Big 12 hit 12 free throws in the last two minutes and reeled off a 9-0 run down the stretch to close out the victory against the last-place Bears, 6-19 overall and 0-12 in conference play, 77-68.

"Well, aesthetically, that's not one they'll put in the archives," Wildcats head coach Tom Asbury said. "Baylor came in with a certain sense of urgency, looking for their first conference victory."

"They played pretty hard down low. We played tentatively, but we played hard."

Free throws were the story, as the Wildcats hit 39 of 51, both Bramlage Coliseum records, which worked out to 76 percent from the line.

For the 18th time this season, K-State outrebounded its opponent, pulling down 38 rebounds to Baylor's 28. The Wildcats are 14-4 when they outrebound their opponents.

Despite K-State's showing on the boards, Asbury said he was very disappointed in one facet of rebounding.

"I was very disappointed with our defensive rebounding," he said. "I'd like to think we're a better defensive rebounding team than that. I was frustrated with how we played, but we did make some hustle plays."

Four K-State seniors scored in double figures, led by senior guard Ayome May with 20 points. Fellow seniors Shawn Rhodes and Chris Griffin each had 15. Senior center Kish Lewis' 14 points led three Baylor players in double figures.

Asbury said consistency is still a problem as the Wildcats shot only 42 percent from the floor.

"Our seniors played extremely well," he said. "But, that's our dilemma. Which guys are going to show up? In conference games, we've been very, very inconsistent."

Defensively, the Wildcats held Baylor to a dismal 36 percent from the field. K-State is 14-1 this season when its opponents shoot less than 40 percent.

"They did a great job of fighting," Baylor head coach Harry Miller said. "I thought they may have tightened up a little bit when the game was close. But they did what they had to do down the stretch. They have a fine ballclub."

The Wildcats started off sluggish as Baylor went on a quick 7-2 run, ignited by junior guard B.J. Sellers' three-pointer. K-State battled back when senior forward Manny Dies hit four foul shots to cut the deficit to one point.

Baylor kept the lead until May reeled off four straight points and tied the game, 16-16, before Shawn Rhodes nailed a three-pointer that gave the Wildcats the lead for good. With six minutes to go in the first half, K-State went on an 11-1 run and took a 34-24 halftime lead.

In the second half, Baylor slowly came back, cutting the lead to three with just less than 13 minutes to go. The Wildcats came back and led by as many as nine, but Baylor wouldn't go away as junior guard Leon Morris hit a three-pointer and Jamie Kendrick and Ben Echols each hit a field goal.

That wasn't enough, though, as seniors Griffin and May led the Wildcats down the stretch and sealed the triumph.

With the season closing fast and K-State still unsure of a tournament berth, Rhodes said the Wildcats needed a key victory.

"That's what we needed," he said. "In a physical game like that, you just need to take charge. This team is not going to quit."

"We have a lot of pride. We are going to keep playing until we can't play no more. We are going to make sure we finish out right."

K-State's Shawn Rhodes (left) and Ayome May (right) scramble with Travis Reynolds (back left) and a Baylor player (back right) while trying to grab a rebound Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum. The Cats beat Baylor, 77-68, keeping their postseason hopes alive.

Seniors lead team in win over Baylor

BY SARAH CRAIG

At one point in K-State's 77-68 victory Saturday over Baylor, the cellar-dwelling Bears led the Wildcats, while K-State struggled to find rhythm and leadership.

Eventually, K-State found the leadership it sought.

K-State's senior leaders stepped up to ensure victory, as Ayome May led the team in scoring and rebounding with 20 points and six rebounds.

Seniors Shawn Rhodes, Manny Dies, Chris Griffin and May contributed most of their points on free throws, helping the team to a 76-percent effort from the line. Rhodes and Griffin each scored 15 points, and Dies scored 13.

"I think it was a very physical game, and I think we did a good job stepping up to take care of it," Rhodes said.

May began the game feeling sick but did not tell head coach Tom Asbury. Instead of sitting out and resting his stomach condition, May played 27 minutes.

"I have been feeling well for a while, but I wasn't today," he said. "I just had to come out and play. I couldn't just sit on the bench."

K-State's free-throw shooting was pivotal in the Wildcats' victory, as the Cats scored 39 of their points from the line.

Leading the free-throw shooting was Dies, who shot 90 percent. Dies was held to just two field goals the entire game, earning nine of his 13 points on foul shots.

"The free throws were just a part of it," Rhodes said. "It was a very physical game. The refs were just trying to keep it clean."

The seniors combined for 63 of the Cats' points.

Although May said he felt he has been consistent this season, Asbury said he was concerned about the outlook of the season because the players have played inconsistently in their 25 games this season.

As for individual play, May surprised Asbury with his performance as he began the game slowly.

"He was playing terrible at the beginning of the game, really bad stomach problems, and I wasn't sure he could play," Asbury said. "But it settled down, and he made some big plays and got some good defensive rebounds."

Reality has finally set in; Cats won't be invited to the Big Dance

VIEWPOINT

McLEMORE

My (belated) Valentine message to the men's basketball team: Thanks for playing. Better luck next season. Drive safely on your way to the NIT (Nationally Ignored Tournament). Pack it up and say your sweet farewells. Make sure you have enough chips and dip in case you or your friends get the munchies while watching the real post-season tournament. I hate to say it, but this show ain't going nowhere.

That's right. I sit here just two weeks removed from claiming the Wildcats would up-end the Jayhawks, and now I'm saying it's all over. The difference? Reality set in. This is a Wildcat team that got torched by Kansas in front of a sellout crowd. This is a Wildcat team that trailed the entire game against lowly Iowa State before pulling off a miracle. This is a Wildcat team that got beat by Texas A&M in a do-or-die situation. This is a Wildcat team that can plan on having most of March free to do something other than basketball.

Of course, there are those of you who disagree, those of you who actually think we still have a chance. Let me clue you in. This glass is half empty.

Don't tell me we're on "the bubble," because I don't buy it. K-State couldn't find the bubble if it were nailed to its collective forehead. The team played less-than-mediocre basketball in a less-than-mediocre conference. Here's a tip: You cannot lose most of your conference games when you don't play good teams.

Sure, we lost to some respectable teams, but not any truly good teams. Missouri, Texas and Kansas are good, but they couldn't spell Final Four if you asked them to.

When I say good I mean good like Kentucky, UConn or Stanford. Heck, I'd pay big bucks if we could even play at the level of Gonzaga or the College of Charleston, but we don't. We can't. We didn't.

There are deserving basketball teams out there that are going to go to the coveted 64-team NCAA Tournament. We won't be one of them. I could probably find 64 teams in the Atlantic Coast Conference alone that are more deserving to go to the Big Dance.

As the season winds down, we once again have made the transition from "mighty" to "mini," from "could be" to "can't be," and from Chicago Bulls to, well, Chicago Bulls. It was painful, but it seems to be getting routine.

The only question that remains now is, which team are we going to lose to in the first round of the NIT?

Even if we won the whole damn thing, even if we became the best of the worst in the NIT, who would notice? No one, that's who.

I know it sounds harsh, but it's time we quit fooling ourselves. My wish, hopeful, "give it your best effort" attitude died at midcourt in the beginning of February as Ryan Robertson and his Jayhawks shoved another loss down our throats. True, a win this Wednesday at Kansas would be great. It would make the whole season worthwhile, but it won't get us anywhere. It would serve as a nice consolation prize in a season that should have been. Hold your breath on Wednesday and hope for a win, but don't count on it.

The game against Texas A&M was the tell-tale game for this season.

It was a must-win game, and we lost it. Let me define "must win" for all of the confused players out there. It means "don't lose." It's as simple as that. I know, it was a road game, and road games in conference play are tough, but winning road games is what makes the big boys on the NCAA selection committee get all happy. They love road wins. They love it when teams can walk onto someone else's court and do their imitation of Mike Tyson with road rage. One measly road win in conference play won't even get you a second look from the tourney officials.

Now, I realize our road win was a tough game against Iowa State where we were behind at halftime. That's the problem. We never should have been losing that bad to begin with. The early deficit was attributed to a slow start. It wasn't a slow start; it was a bad start. Bad starts hurt post-season chances. True, the win at home against Oklahoma was a big win, but you can't hang your hat on one win all season long.

In order to step up and play among the elite, we have to get several big wins. We have to string together a few road wins.

We have to beat everyone on our home court. When that happens, maybe I'll get back my mushy side.

Maybe I'll start predicting wins when I shouldn't be predicting wins. Maybe we'll see the NCAA Tournament.

In the meantime, let's focus on finishing off the season respectably, winning at Kansas and pulling off an upset in the Big 12 Tournament.

That would truly be a great (belated) Valentine gift. No flowers required.

The Da Vinci String Quartet

Artists-in-residence conclude with arts advocacy speech

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

SPEECH

The quartet will speak about arts advocacy at 11:30 a.m. in McCain 204.

The Da Vinci String Quartet are the artists-in-residence for the K-State orchestra this semester and have been working closely with the collegiate musicians over the past few days.

The four women of the quartet arrived on campus Friday and will continue residency until Tuesday. Thus far, the quartet members have given a number of recitals on campus. Today they will be part of a panel discussion about women in music in Hale Library's Hemisphere Room at 10:30 a.m. They also will teach both a college solo and college chamber music masterclass this afternoon.

The quartet, which has been performing since 1980, is known for its variety of musical styles, including pieces from the baroque, classical, romantic and 20th-century periods.

Cora Cooper, associate professor of music, said she believes the quartet's diverse music will appeal to an even more diverse community.

"They're doing this as an outreach to the community and to reach a diverse group of people here in Manhattan," Cooper said. "The members of this quartet are very well-rounded musicians with a lot of interests."

Because Cooper worked with the quartet 10 years ago at a chamber orchestra camp, she said she knows how excited the quartet is to be able to teach college students. Her students are excited as well, she said.

"They've been so enthusiastic about this event," she said. "And I'm sure the members of the quartet are impressed with the enthusiasm of the students."

Bill Slechta, graduate student in music and member of the K-State Orchestra, said the quartet's residency not only will teach the students in the Department of Music, but others in the community as well.

"The quartet's presentations benefit a wide range of people, not only in the music department, but in the campus community itself," he said.

Slechta said the benefits the orchestra receives from the residency are many.

"The quartet is helping us play better, both as individual musicians, and as a group," he said. "They're greatly improving our musicianship."

Cooper said it is not at all unusual for artists such as the Da Vinci String Quartet to come to colleges and universities to perform and give workshops and clinics.

"It's a trend going on nationwide, having a group of well-known musicians come to the community for an extended period of time," Cooper said.

What sets this residency apart from the others, she said, is the people the quartet tries to reach. The members of the quartet are known for their work with women who have histories of drug abuse or domestic violence, Cooper said, the quartet also tries to give histories of women in music through the pieces they perform.

Kristin Hermes, senior in public relations and French, said she particularly enjoyed this aspect of the quartet's music.

"What is different about the Da Vinci String Quartet is the way they reach out," she said. "They try to bring art to the people and benefit women who come from disadvantaged backgrounds."

"Some of those women don't have a background in the cultural arts, and it is very reassuring to see how they can relate to this music."

The Da Vinci String Quartet will conclude its residency Tuesday with a speech about arts advocacy at 11:30 a.m. in McCain 204 and a high school masterclass for invited high school quartets at 2:30 p.m. in All Faiths Chapel.

Wendolyn Olson explains the good aspects of romantic-period music while Jeri Jorgensen listens Friday afternoon at the First United Methodist Church Temple Hall. The Da Vinci Quartet performed examples from the baroque, classical, romantic and modern eras of music to elementary school children.

'At First Sight' isn't worth your 5 bucks

BY GIGI MCCALL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The movie "At First Sight," though contrived to make you cry, is probably not worth the money it takes to get into a movie theater.

The movie casts Mira Sorvino as Amy Benic, a New York City architect, and Val Kilmer as Virgil Adamson, a blind masseur.

Virgil, who has been blind since childhood, falls in love with Amy, who encourages him to have an operation that might restore his eyesight.

Afraid of losing Amy, Virgil has the operation but faces the struggle of adjusting to his newfound sight. Virgil has to learn to adapt what he has always felt to what he now sees and to develop hand-eye coordination.

Ultimately, though, Virgil learns to adapt and to revel in his sight.

"At First Sight" is based on a true story documented by Oliver Sacks, physician and author of "Awakenings."

The on-screen chemistry between Kilmer and Sorvino was virtually nonexistent; their characters never really seemed connected to each other. The movie fails to hold the viewers' interest. The story, though rooted in truth, struggles to be believable because the bond between the characters lacks potency.

While the romance left much to be desired, the story was emotionally moving. The movie gives a real idea of what it must be like to be blind and what it means to be in a relationship with a blind person.

Kilmer gives an excellent portrayal of the life Virgil leads without eyesight, showing an intricate reliance on other senses.

This movie is riddled with scenes guaranteed to get your tear ducts flowing. However, it probably is a good idea to treat that special someone to "At First Sight" when it comes out on video.

Language Learning Center changes staff, continues computer upgrade

BY GIGI MCCALL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The K-State Language Learning Center of the Department of Modern Languages has gone through many changes this semester.

Last fall, it had a new director and staff. Not only have staff members had to adjust to one another and to their new positions, but they also are learning to adjust to new computer software.

Jamie Belcher, senior in accounting, works as a lab monitor for the LLC. Last semester was a challenge for lab staff, she said.

"Last semester, the staff was made up of all new people," she said. "It was crazy around here until we got the kinks worked out."

Brian Barnett, lab monitor and a freshman in French and Spanish, said he agreed.

"Students would have questions about how to work the programs," Barnett said, "and we wouldn't be able to answer them."

In addition to getting the new lab monitors settled in, the center is working to improve lab technology available to modern-language students. Belcher said she credits LLC's director, Rosey Zackula, for implementing new computer software in the lab.

"Rosey has done a lot to update our equipment this semester," Belcher said. "It's really important to her that students have good technology available to them."

Zackula, who was hired last semester, said the center began work during winter break to install a computer server and to connect and upgrade each of the lab computers, a project that is ongoing. She said she looks forward to the project's completion.

"Once this is complete, then students using lab computers will have access to all the language software," Zackula said.

The lab staff also is using a new computer program to keep track of students using lab resources.

Belcher said the computer database used by the center through the end of last semester had been problematic. She said many students enrolled in modern-language classes are required by their instructors to work through interactive computer programs or listen to tapes that follow their course work for an allotted amount of time each week.

Belcher also said the modern-language department has a new policy this semester. Instead of being able to wait until the end of the semester to get their lab-time requirements filled, students need to attend for a regular amount of time each week.

Using a computer-filing program, monitors keep a record of the amount of time each student spends in the lab.

Belcher said the program they had been using wasn't always reliable. To correct the problem, the center changed its computer programming.

"We are having much better success tracking students' times this semester," Belcher said. "The new program seems a lot more secure."

Union Bookstore coupon shorts customers 34 cents

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A mistake with a K-State Union Bookstore coupon caused a ruckus after two students discovered a costly error at the beginning of the semester.

When Leah Suellentrop, senior in agricultural economics, and her brother, David Bahre, sophomore in milling science management, paid for their textbooks in January, they noticed a miscalculation in how a coupon deduction was made.

"The Union is a nonprofit agency, and our student fees pay professionals to run the store," Suellentrop said. "It's irritating when any accountant can't see the mistake."

The coupon, sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, was good for $5 off any purchase of $25 or more at the bookstore.

The error occurred because the cash registers didn't take the $5 off until after tax was charged on the full price of an item. The correct method is to deduct the $5 before the tax and sub-

A state statute says anyone with a receipt has up to three years to collect a refund. Until then, the money is left in the hands of the Kansas Department of Revenue.

This resulted in a 34-cent overcharge for each coupon.

The Chamber of Commerce, however, printed 15,000 copies of the coupon, which means the error would amount to more than $5,000 if every receipt showing a coupon used was returned.

After contacting the Kansas Department of Revenue, Suellentrop and Bahre took their discovery to Jack Thoman, assistant director of business affairs at the Union.

"He was defensively polite," Bahre said. "Even if it wasn't intentional, it was incompetent."

Thoman counted more than $900 in errors from the coupons the bookstore received in just three days.

Once Thoman realized the magnitude of the problem, he took action right away, Suellentrop said. He called the company that sold the registers and got a different option for ringing sales and retrained the cashiers.

"This was in no way intentional," Thoman said. "It was simply an oversight situation."

The Bookstore has operated with the registers for almost a year and a half. Since then, the coupon has been dealt with the same way each semester.

"It's irritating for me to overpay taxes," Bahre said.

Students who used the coupon and want the 34-cent refund must take the receipt showing proof to the bookstore.

A state statute says anyone with a receipt has up to three years to collect a refund. Until then, the money is left in the hands of the Kansas Department of Revenue.

"This has been a little embarrassing," Thoman said. "But we're making a concerted effort to let people know they can get a refund with proof of a receipt."

New programs offer listeners variety of talk-show choices

KSDB-FM 91.9 features talk shows covering sex, music, politics and sports.

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KSDB-FM 91.9 has a new format of talk shows to accompany its new image.

The station will broadcast a different talk show from 4 to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

"This is a huge change," said Jeremy Clacys, junior in electronic journalism and KSDB program director. "Listenership has certainly increased."

Monday's show, "The Schmak Down," was an immediate hit, Clacys said.

The program is about professional wrestling, with lead host Joe Wilson talking about what's new on Monday nights with the World Wrestling Federation and World Championship Wrestling.

"The show addresses weekly rumors," Clacys said, "so basically it's a male soap opera."

The show received 12 calls in one hour the first day it aired.

Tuesday's talk show features different members of the station's sports staff with "Sports Talk."

"Wasting America's Fire" airs on Wednesdays. Hosts Paul Bollman, freshman in electronic journalism, and Christopher McLemore, junior in political science, discuss a variety of campus, state, local and national current events.

"Each show is centralized around something," Bollman said. "We talk about my take and my co-host's take with the issue at hand."

When the station was DB92, it had "A Purple Affair" two nights a week from 9 to 10 p.m. The program dealt more with guests than issues.

"Our format has changed predominantly because of the time slot," McLemore said. "Now, it's a news-driven show."

Thursday's show is "Soapdish." Hosts Mimi Davidson and Jodi Fagerquist chat with their callers about soap operas.

"We've had great response that it's been really entertaining," Clacys said.

Friday's show features Dr. Wendy Blank, director of the Women's Clinic at Lafene Health Center, who has a program dealing with sexually related topics.

"It's to provide accurate information about sexually related concerns," Blank said.

The weekends take a look inside different types of music.

Hosts Andrew Pesci, Matt Scheck and Sarah Florie discuss the local music scene on Saturdays.

Drew Maenche and Aaron Sefton talk about what's behind Christian rock on Sundays.

"I just hope the listeners really enjoy the shows," said Ernie Saville, senior in kinesiology and talk-show producer at Wildcat 91.9. "They're educational and entertaining at the same time."

With its variety of shows, the Wildcat 91.9 will be competing for the Peabody Award for National Talk Shows in April, Saville said.

"We're getting a diverse group of people every day listening to a multiple selection of shows," Saville said. "There's a little bit of something for everyone."

Shuttle provides parking alternative

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shuttle service has not solved the parking problem at K-State, but it continues to provide a means of transportation for some.

When the university started moving some of its facilities to the outskirts of campus a few years ago, Parking Services saw a need for a shuttle service.

"It was designed mainly to keep people from the opposite ends of the campus from fighting for parking spots on the main campus," Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said.

The shuttle initially was designed to move faculty and staff working at Edwards Hall, KSU Foundation, Veterinary Medicine Complex and any other building on the outskirts to the K-State Student Union for meetings throughout the day. Many students at Jardine Terrace Apartments use the shuttle as well.

The shuttle makes stops every half-hour between 7:45 a.m. and 4:45 p.m.

It travels from Edwards to the Union, to the Foundation and then back to the Union and Edwards.

Joe Pinsky, senior in financing and conference parking coordinator, uses the shuttle four times a week to travel to and from classes.

"It's fine for the purposes I need," Pinsky said. "It serves me well."

The service operates on days classes are in session. A common complaint from its users is that the shuttle doesn't run during spring break, winter break or weekends.

Last fall, Parking Services invested in a new shuttle vehicle that can seat up to 14 people and is better equipped for getting in and people continually out.

The number of riders has increased slightly since the new shuttle bus has been in operation.

About 93 people take advantage of the service each week.

"The biggest holdback is that there's only one shuttle and the service is funded through Parking Services," said Jeff Barnes, the safety security officer at Parking Services.

Parking Services is hesitant to advertise the shuttle service to more people, in addition to those on the outer limits of campus, because it doesn't have the capabilities with only one shuttle to accommodate a high number of people.

"We're afraid of getting overcrowded loads," Barnes said. "At this point, we wouldn't know how to address that sort of situation."

Even with this small shuttle service available, parking conditions on campus are not likely to improve much, Abbott said.

"The problem is that it's a limited shuttle service with a limited budget to do a limited thing," he said.

behavior wound up frustrated by a legislative maneuver that deprived them of a vote.

The only satisfaction, perhaps, was an end to the 13-month ordeal. Winners? Hard to find.

"No one is going to get scot free in the minds of most voters," Republican strategist Ralph Reed said. "Clinton is not going to be viewed as exonerated. Everyone is a loser."

"There can be, I fear, no happy ending," Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., said.

Trial of the century? Hardly. It broke no new ground about the tawdry story of Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky or his efforts to conceal their relationship. Senators gave magnificent speeches, baring heart and soul. Majority Leader Trent Lott said afterward. But all their splendid oratory was unheard by Americans, spoken behind closed doors.

Unlike the bitterly divided House, the Senate took pride in its air of civility and a measure of bipartisanship. Ten Republicans joined Democrats in voting, 55-45, to acquit Clinton of perjury. Five Republicans broke with their party as the Senate split, 50-50, on the charge of obstruction of justice.

Despite the gravity of its assignment, the Senate applauded itself and went home in a congratulatory mood, its 100 Republicans and Democrats hoping they have repaired their reputations in the eyes of voters.

Byrd, one of the most respected voices of the Senate, saw no cause for celebration.

"All of the institutions of government, the presidency, the House of Representatives, the Senate, the system of justice and law, yes, even the media — all have been damaged by this unhappy and sorry chapter in our nation's history," he said.

After the Watergate scandal drove Richard Nixon from office 25 years ago, President Ford tried to heal the nation's wounds, declaring at his swearing-in, "Our long national nightmare is over."

Similarly, Clinton tried to bring closure Friday by saying his acquittal should be "a time of reconciliation and renewal for America."

"I want to say again to the American people how profoundly sorry I am for what I said and did to trigger these events, and the great burden they have imposed on the Congress and the American people," Clinton said.

If he had expressed such sentiments last Aug. 17, when he appeared defiant after his grand-jury testimony, the whole impeachment drama probably would not have occurred.

With two years remaining in his term, Clinton has an opportunity to try to rebuild his legacy beyond the impeachment saga.

"I don't think it destroys his presidency," said Mark Rozell, University of Pennsylvania political scientist.

"It is plausible historians will look back and be very critical of Congress for its actions and not consider the president so strongly tainted by the impeachment. But without a doubt, even his strongest defenders acknowledge this president behaved badly, and that will be part of his legacy no matter what."

During the past year, Republicans suffered along with Clinton, plunging at the polls last November. They lost House Speaker Newt Gingrich after he mismanaged the GOP's Lewinsky strategy and then Speaker-to-be Robert Livingston when he was forced to admit his own indiscretions. Republicans need healing, too, and to prove to Americans that they stand for more than impeachment.

It is uncertain how closely Clinton and Republicans can work together for the remainder of his term — although analysts in both parties believe it's in the best interest of Congress and the White House to find common ground.

"They both — for very separate reasons that are closely tied to their political survival — need to demonstrate an ability to get something done," Reed said.

Lott said grudgingly, "We have to deal with him as long as he's president."

Historian Brinkley said: "I think the memories of this and the impact of this will reverberate for a very long time. This just has accelerated the trend in politics toward a kind of partisan hatred, tactical savagery, that's been going on since the '70s and particularly the '80s."

"I think serving as a student senator is one of the best educational opportunities that a student can have," he said.

Arts and Sciences Senator Chris Crowder got involved a year ago because Senate supports what he wants to do with his career in politics.

"It makes me feel good to help campus," he said.

Some people might be concerned about the time commitment to Senate, but Crowder said it doesn't interfere with his student life.

"You can still have fun and you can still study," he said. "It's not incredible amounts of time."

However, students also can still get involved without running for a seat if they are concerned about the time commitment.

Students can be at-large members of a Senate standing committee, serve on a judiciary board, become a cabinet member in the executive branch or serve as an intern.

The senator internship program is designed to provide younger K-State students an opportunity to learn about SGA and to help them get more involved in the future.

"We've made a real effort to expose them to all three branches of Student Senate this year," Eckert said.

Interns have all the same duties as senators, except they are not elected and do not have voting rights. They serve on a standing committee, attend intern meetings and Senate meetings.

Interested students can apply in the fall for an internship. Then, they are selected by the Senate vice chair, intern coordinator and Senate Operations Committee Chair.

Each year there are 12 to 25 positions open for interns. There were 21 interns this year and Eckert said he hopes they decide to run for senator positions.

"We've had a really outstanding intern class this year," Eckert said.

BEANIES

Cara Hageman, sophomore in elementary and special education, was helping her mom, Donna Edwards, sell some of the repeats from her collection.

"I help sell them on the Internet and at shows like this, but we do most of our selling on the Internet," Hageman said.

Hageman said the family has a spare bedroom that is used for storage of the stuffed toy collection.

"It's kind of fun to sell them like this, but I would never buy them for myself," Hageman said.

Edwards said she started the collection after her older sister got her interested in some of the ocean creatures from late 1996. With four kids, she said she initially had planned on buying some of the animals for each of them.

"I just started collecting, and the collection just got too big and out of hand," Edwards said. "When I started collecting there were 68, and I remember people advertising their entire collections for sale."

Edwards said she thinks there are about 200 Beanie Babies styles, of which about 150 are retired.

"They retire about every six months, and I make a list and box them," Edwards said.

Sherry Wheeler, show coordinator, said she was pleased with the success of the show.

"It was everything I expected it to be," Wheeler said. "People are walking out of here with things they hadn't seen before."

Communications, said he understood the reason for the change but made clear that he was not entirely satisfied with it.

"I understand the political virtue of the movement, but I would like to point out that the school has donated $13,000," Simon said.

Business Senator Nick Muetting said the bill should be held to let the emotions of the Senate concerning the allocation request cool.

The committee is also waiting to review the final audit report of KSDB to be released in the next few weeks.

The regular privilege fee budget for KSDB also was held for one week, and will be discussed Feb. 21.

The committee also moved to hold the budget requests made by KSU Libraries.

The request was held after discussion on its merit as a "privilege."

Committee members are reviewing a bill that would suggest funding through tuition increases to cover the costs of periodicals, journals, electronic resources, other research materials and general-use publications.

"A privilege fee is not the proper place for a request if it is essential to the success of the university," Muetting said.

"Money is money, whether it is a privilege fee or tuition increase. The point we need to make during the bill is whether or not this is a privilege fee," he said.

Mike Hofer, (left) graduate student in agronomy, helps 10-year-old Edward Currier with his math homework Monday night at the Douglass Center Annex. Hofer was helping Currier as part of the Hand to Hand Program, which provides tutors for children four times a week at the annex.

More than 120 students have been tutored since the Hand to Hand Program started 2-1/2 years ago. The program is offered to elementary and secondary students.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Douglass Community Center, a local center for all ages, keeps its doors open 361 days a year with a mission to provide a community program that is informative and educational.

With help from volunteers, donations from local merchants, and a paid staff, the center offers an array of activities for the young as well as the old. It is designed to give children and older adults a place to go and something to do.

"Everyone is welcome here," Douglass Community Center Director Larry Nicholson said. "The center is a unique place because no one pays a fee. Kids can come here and be with their friends, play basketball with our morning and noon programs and get help with their studies."

The center has two buildings. One is used for recreation, and has a weight room, TV room and a basketball court that is also used for a basketball clinic for fourth and fifth grade students.

The other building, Douglass Center Annex, which is across the street from the gym, includes meeting rooms for local non-profit organizations to use the facilities for birthday parties, church groups and showers.

It also has a day care for children 2 1/2-years-old to first grade that is free to use and is affiliated with the Manhattan Day Care Association.

Besides arts and crafts and basketball, weekly movies focusing on diversity, ethnicity and culture are shown at 7:15 p.m. every Wednesday through March 10 at the Douglass Community Center Annex.

The center is funded by City of Manhattan. Nicholson said the budget limits the center's ability to have all the activities he would like.

"Sometimes we will have money left over, and we can do something special. But in the meantime, with the help of donations, we do all that we can, and the children know this," Nicholson said.

He said a goal of the Center was to offer an after-school tutoring program for students to enhance their skills and get help if needed.

"I have always wanted to implement a tutoring program into the center," Nicholson said. "It has been my dream to have a place where kids could come and have the opportunity to learn and be involved in a program that is designed for them."

The Hand to Hand program has depended on two people, Marianne Cullers and Don Slater. This program specializes in helping students in elementary and secondary schools but also tutors high schools students.

Cullers is a retired high school math teacher who started this program with Nicholson four years ago. She retired early but still wanted to teach. Tutoring allows her to spend time helping children on a more one-on-one basis, she said.

"Our program lets children be tutored in a subject that their teacher has sent home with them, and then we go over it with them," Cullers said. "After they have finished the homework, then they can do something fun."

The tutoring program, which meets four nights a week and tutors 1 to 20 students a night, also gives children rewards.

"We give the student a city map, and they follow a trail of highlights around Manhattan. After making it to each destination, they receive stickers that illustrate their progress," Cullers said. "These give the children a goal to strive for and also learn in the process."

Slater, former member of the Douglass Center Advisory Board, said the perfect time to catch children having difficulty in school is in elementary school.

The program does a lot for the children, but it also affects those involved with the program.

"When they are successful, and you see the smile on their faces, it puts a smile on my face, too," Slater said.

Tutors come from the community, members of the Manhattan Area Retired Teachers Association and from K-State.

Many of those who participate from K-State are from a multicultural class that requires K-State students to come and tutor for an hour.

Jennifer Burrus, senior in elementary education, chose to return after visiting the center for the first time.

"I like working one-on-one with the children. It gives me experience with children," Burrus said. "It also allows me to use techniques that I can use in the future."

About 200 people visit the Douglass Center, which is located at 901 Yuma St., a day. Its hours are 6:30 a.m. until 10 p.m., Monday through Friday, 2 to 3 p.m. and 7-10 p.m. Saturday and 2-6 p.m. Sunday.

"This center is for everyone in the community," Nicholson said.

"It allows for growth and gives strength to kids. And with the skills gained here, they can utilize them to a higher level of succession."

Lectures to resume in March

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former Sen. Howard Baker will speak at 10:30 a.m. March 9 in McCain Auditorium, ending a year without any Landon Lectures.

Baker was a Tennessee Republican senator from 1967 to 1985. He served as minority leader from 1977 to 1981 and was majority leader from 1981 to 1985. He was chief of staff for President Ronald Reagan from 1987 to 1988.

Baker served in the U.S. Navy from 1943 to 1946 and graduated from the University of Tennessee law college in 1949. He was also Landon Lecture speaker in 1979 with his lecture "Toward a New Republic."

Edward Seaton, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series patrons, said Baker's involvement in Watergate has put him in the news recently and helped the committee decide it was timely to invite him to speak.

"He has been getting a lot of attention because he was the minority chairman of the Senate during Watergate," Seaton said. "He has a lot of experience with impeachment."

Seaton said he didn't know what Baker will speak about.

"He will probably talk about the issues of today in American politics," President Jon Wefald said.

Wefald said the Landon Lecture Series committee looks at leading policy makers around America and the world, then it looks at people who are nationally and internationally known in the media.

Seaton said there are invitations out for future Landon Lectures, and there are a number of tentative speakers. A tentative speaker has been chosen for March 29, but details have not been released.

Iraq threatens to attack Turkish base

By LEON BARKHO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq threatened Monday to attack a Turkish base for U.S. warplanes, along with other American and British bases in the region, if the jets continue patrolling Iraqi skies.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright promised swift U.S. retaliation in event of an Iraqi attack.

Iraqi vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan's threat, coming in an interview with Radio Monte Carlo, marked the first time in years that Iraq has threatened to attack neighboring Turkey.

U.S. jets based at Incirlik, in southern Turkey, have struck almost daily at Iraqi defense sites after being targeted by Iraqi defenses while patrolling the no-fly zone over the north of the country.

Ramadan also repeated Iraq's threat made Sunday against other bases in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait from which U.S. and British jets patrol a southern no-fly zone. The Arab League denounced this earlier threat Monday.

"If the Turkish base continues attacking Iraq, it will certainly be (targeted) like other bases (in the Persian Gulf)," Ramadan said.

"I say if America and Britain do not retreat, they'll soon pay dearly in relation to the properties and elements they use to launch aggression on the people of Iraq," he said.

Responding to the threat, President Clinton's top foreign policy advisers on Monday warned that if Iraq attacked the Turkish base, the United States would react sharply.

"We have made very clear that were there any

Negotiations resume with pilots

■ American Airline pilots return to work after 10-day sick out.

By KATIE FAIRBANK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DALLAS — Most of American Airlines' flights took off as scheduled Monday as negotiations resumed between the company and its pilot union, 10 days after pilots began a sickout that tangled travel for more than a half-million passengers.

About 800 of American's 9,400 pilots still were listed as sick Monday, down from the nearly 2,500 who were out Thursday and Friday, airline officials said. Cancellations of 11 percent of flights were no worse than a day of bad weather in a hub city, officials said.

American's parent company, AMR Corp., and the Allied Pilots Association went back to the table to negotiate the integration of recently purchased Reno Air.

The two were in virtually the same place they were when pilots began calling in sick and refusing overtime, canceling thousands of flights and costing the airline tens of millions. Neither side has changed their stance on pay for pilots who fly for Reno Air.

About 250 of the 2,250 flights scheduled were canceled because some pilots weren't immediately available for flying. The Fort Worth-based airline had canceled only 17 flights scheduled for Tuesday, spokesman John Hotard said.

According to American, pilots have been taking themselves off the sick list at a rapid rate since a federal judge on Saturday held the union and two top board members in contempt and promised sizable fines against them.

Some pilots said that the number on the sick list could have been inflated because they had been trying to get off of the sick list and back to work, but airline officials wouldn't let them. Instead, the pilots were told they had to meet with their chief medical officer.

Hotard said that was true for only 12 or 13 pilots who face possible disciplinary action for flying as passengers after they had called in sick to work.

U.S. District Judge Joe Kendall threatened a significant fine against the pilots' union Saturday, saying that the union did not do enough to encourage pilots to return to work after he ordered the union to end the sickout last Wednesday.

The judge required the union place $10 million, or

Dean honored during Founder's Day meeting

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mary Van Zile was a voice for the female students of Kansas State Agricultural College both on and off the campus.

Cynthia Harris, junior in history, wrote a final paper for her History Junior Seminar about the life of Van Zile and the mark she left on the history of K-State. The paper was presented at the K-State Historical Society's Founder's Day spring meeting, which was the day before K-State's 136th birthday.

The Kansas State Agricultural College was founded on February 16, 1863.

Harris was unable to present the paper herself, but Pat Patton, research specialist in university archives, did so in her absence.

"Cindy did a very in-depth profile of her life," Patton said. "She spent a lot of hours on it, and there was even some information in it that I didn't know."

Harris spanned the life of Van Zile from the time she was born through her 32 years as the first dean of women at K-State to her death in 1949.

Van Zile served as professor of domestic science, dean of women and dean of the division of home economics from 1908 until 1918, when she asked to be relieved of all duties except for dean of women.

"With more than 1,000 women in home economics classes, she asked to devote more time to the women," Patton said, in the paper prepared by Harris.

Van Zile worked hard to prove that home economics was professional work through the practical experience of preparing meals and making women better wives and daughters.

Jill Rooney, freshmen in biology, said she realized through the lecture what it was like to be a female student at K-State almost 100 years ago.

"It is remarkable what she did by pushing women forward from oppression," Rooney said. "She took a stand in women's education."

Van Zile also was instrumental in creating the first recreation center in the old chapel in Anderson Hall and for attaining the funds to build Van Zile Hall in 1926.

Louise Ferguson, 1933 graduate of KSAC, knew Van Zile through her experiences in home economics that at the time, she said, had a high reputation throughout the country.

"She helped me get a job right away and was very approachable," Ferguson said. "She took an interest in everyone."

Van Zile also was interested in the health and safety of all her female students while at K-State. She was involved

New bill would add limits to Kansas Open Meetings Act

TOPEKA — Public bodies could conduct preliminary discussions behind closed doors about selling public property under legislation that adds restrictions to the Kansas Open Meetings Act.

The bill was considered Monday by the Senate Elections and Local Government Committee, which last week sent the Senate a bill adding a 13th exception to the Open Meetings law.

That measure, which would allow private meetings by public bodies to discuss security measures, passed the Senate, although it deleted language allowing public bodies to discuss "emergencies" in private because some thought the term was too vague.

The committee took no action Monday on the bill that would allow any public body to meet behind closed doors to discuss public property sales and matters concerning appointments to non-elected boards and commissions.

Among those supporting narrowing the Open Meetings Act were the Kansas Association of School Boards and the League of Kansas Municipalities.

"Both to us seem like common-sense exceptions that haven't been put into law," said John Koepke, of the school boards' group.

Koepke said the law already permits closed-door discussions about real estate purchases. He also said the law still requires all formal actions by a public body to be done in an open session.

"Once you've set a price in a public meeting, you made it clear what you will pay," Koepke said.

Sen. Rich Becker, R-Lenexa, said he could see the value of making discussions of appointments to non-elected boards and commissions off limits to public scrutiny.

"They don't want to be subjected to that for a job they don't get paid for. It bothers good people who want to serve and not be subjected to all the non-sense," Becker said.

Harriet Lange, president of the Kansas Association of Broadcasters, spoke against the bill. She said the public should know how decisions are made.

"The public discussion of the sale of public property or appointments to boards and commissions may be uncomfortable for some public officials," she said. "This is the price we pay for living in an open and free society."

Dole promotes education, higher quality of teachers

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Elizabeth Dole, who's considering a bid for president, courted the nation's college and university leaders Monday and laid out an education platform centered on teacher quality.

Dole also championed school choice and accountability, ideas popular with fellow Republicans, and she stressed to the educators that she was one of them and wasn't there to bash them.

"I've refused to join those who often find it expedient to turn teachers into rhetorical punching bags," said Dole, who described her own stint teaching 11th grade history in suburban Boston.

"Yes, we should expect the best out of our teachers. Yes, we should reward outstanding performances. ... But let us never forget that the true heroes of our society are not to be found on a movie screen or a football field. They are to be found in our classrooms."

Dole, 62, also promised the American Council on Education she would champion higher learning. The council is a nonprofit lobbying group for all accredited colleges and universities.

"I don't know where the future will take me," she told more than 1,000 educators, "but I do know that if you are recruiting soldiers in the battle to strengthen federal investment in research, I'm ready to enlist right now."

The focus should be on turning out teachers better equipped to instruct a generation of students, Dole said.

"There should be a zero-tolerance policy toward bad teaching," she said. "If teaching is to become a prestigious profession, teachers must undergo rigorous training and hold prestigious degrees."

"We all know the results of poorly focused learning," she said. "Our colleges and universities have to pick up the slack."

Serbian president rejects NATO peacekeeping troops

PARIS — Serbia is willing to make compromises and grant rival ethnic Albanians broad self-rule, but it adamantly opposes having NATO troops police a Kosovo agreement, the republic's president said Monday.

For the first time since the Kosovo peace conference started Feb. 6, Milan Milutinovic indicated Serbs were willing to give up most of the demands that have stalled the talks — with the exception of NATO peacekeeping troops.

"We don't think that the troops are needed if the agreement is good and acceptable to the majority of people living in Kosovo," Milutinovic told The Associated Press, adding that abandoning NATO demands for a peacekeeping force was a precondition for any eventual peace deal.

Asked whether the proposed NATO deployment was the biggest sticking point and the rest was negotiable, he said: "Yes, that is right."

Milutinovic spoke as the Kosovo conference headed toward a fast-approaching deadline, with the United States pressuring the Serbians to make a deal with Kosovo Albanians or prepare to be bombed by NATO forces.

Milutinovic said NATO deployment would "badly damage our sovereignty" and that NATO bombing raids in the absence of an agreement would amount to "an aggression and a war crime."

Also on Monday, British military vehicles and heavy guns were moved from Germany to Greece for use in a possible NATO intervention in Kosovo, the British army said.

With just five days to the deadline set by the United States and five of its European allies for a deal to be signed, Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov on Monday visited the 14th-century French chateau where the conference was.

Russia was pushing as hard as the United States for a resolution of the Kosovo conflict by Saturday, but Moscow opposes the use of NATO airstrikes and is noncommittal on the deployment of international peacekeeping troops.

Ivanov, after meeting with both delegations, told reporters he was convinced they realize the importance of the moment.

"I would like to emphasize, once again, that only a political settlement is possible," he said. "There is no military solution to this problem."

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

Due to a reporter's error, the privilege fee article in Monday's Collegian contained several mistakes.

The $12,958 subtracted from the emergency allocation request from KSDB-FM 91.9 came from the KSU Foundation accounts of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications. In addition, spending from Springfest '98 is only part of the reason behind the deficit for KSDB.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

Mock interviews prepare students

By LORI OLEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A firm handshake, practice and prior knowledge of a company during an interview might help secure internships or employment.

About 450 employers give interviews on campus each year, 300 of whom interview in the fall and 150 in the spring, said Mary Marston, Career and Employment Services assistant director and experiential learning coordinator.

She said companies like students who have researched them. Many employers now have Web sites that can make researching convenient.

"It's easy to get the most current information from the Web," she said. "CES also has files and videotapes about companies that send them."

The interviews give the students experience for future interviews.

"In an interview, it still comes down to the basic things including eye contact, being able to give specific examples and being precise," Rod Schmitz, Lawrence's Kohl's Department Store manager, said.

Interviews can be strengthened by citing examples of relevant experiences, Reamur Donnally, Kohl's vice president district manager, said.

"Saying you're a good leader is fine, but also have two to three strong examples to show how you've been a good leader," Donnally said.

Practice is the best way to continually improve interviewing skills, Marston said.

"Have that little speech down pat about yourself," she said. "Most employers have kind of a set script they work off of, so the interviewer may have some of the same questions. Even if you've had a mock interview and know what kind of questions to practice, it will be beneficial."

To participate in on-campus interviews, students must register with Career and Employment Services in Holtz Hall. Interviews are preselect, meaning students can sign up, and then the company selects students to interview. Marston said some companies might choose to have open sign-ups for students from any major.

She said it is best not to limit options when choosing what companies to interview with.

"We tell students to never be put off by what it says they are looking for," Marston said. "If you think you've got a chance, and it's the industry you want, you might as well try. The worst they could do is throw your résumé away."

Many employers are interviewing for internship positions as well as full-time. Companies also are beginning to look for younger interns, Marston said.

"Some of it is just due to the labor shortage," Marston said. "In Kansas City where the unemployment is about 2 percent, they're hoping to get them in, train them and get them acclimated to the company in hopes that they'll stay."

Donnally, whose company interviews on campus in both fall and spring, said internships give them a chance to showcase its program and also gives the candidates a chance to gain career-related experience.

"Any type of experience in your chosen field is beneficial, and an internship serves you well, even as a freshman or sophomore," Donnally said.

"Oftentimes we look beyond the internships and see if this person would be a great candidate to come back and work for us."

Marston said it is important to not be discouraged if a particular interview does not turn into a position with a company.

"If you don't get the job offer, a lot of times it's because they're looking for that fit," Marston said. "If you can't move, you're not relocatable or you just don't match that fit, you sometimes don't get picked. It's not always that you didn't do as well or wouldn't do a good job."

JEFF COOPER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matt Christensen, senior in history education, is silhouetted by his overhead notes as he explains problems of dyslexia during his speech "Learning Knows No Bounds," part of the National Mortar Board Week Celebration.

Learning drives student

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The ability to overcome obstacles is driven by one thing — a love for learning.

Matt Christensen should know. The K-State senior maintains a 3.47 grade point average, works as an academic counselor and is a member of the K-State Mortar Board.

And he has dyslexia. Christensen spoke Monday night in Forum Hall. His speech, "Learning Knows No Bounds," was presented by the Mortar Board.

Christensen, who was classified as dyslexic in second grade, related his experiences and frustrations of growing up to the audience. He said continuous learning was the key to overcoming those obstacles.

"Learning doesn't stop when you are done with the school day," he said. "It never stops."

Christensen spoke extensively with the audience about how frustrating the school day could be for him.

"Reading and math were the two areas that really caused me trouble," he said. "When your teacher makes you read in front of a group, you start to feel the pressure."

For example, he said he would, and still does, struggle with simple words such as "was," which he reads as "saw." He also confuses "unite" with "unite," "nuclear" with "unclear," "first" with "frist," and "friend" with "freind."

"These are the words I struggle with, and they're just simple words," he said. "A lot of the time, they're words that won't be caught when I spell-check my essay."

"And I spend all of my time deciding which word is going to come first," he said, mis-speaking on purpose.

Christensen said he also had to struggle with his learning disability when he played high school football.

He told the audience a story about his first game when he confused the plays, which were distinguished by numbers.

"The coach said something to me I'll never forget. He said, 'Christensen, you ran every one of those plays backwards.' And I could see the look of disappointment on his face."

Amy Ebert, the leadership chairwoman for Mortar Board, said Christensen's speech effectively kicked off National Mortar Board Week.

SGA needs passion, charisma in leaders

The challenge for candidates running for Student Governing Association is clear — get the student body interested.

There's a huge difference between voter apathy in America and voter apathy at K-State. In national elections, people choose not to vote because they believe one vote won't make a difference. At K-State, however, students choose not to vote because they just don't care.

To some extent, it's not their fault. What the campus really needs is a leader who's not afraid of taking a stand on important issues. SGA needs someone with charisma and originality.

Likewise, students with an interest in campus issues should run for office, whether it be for the executive branch, Senate or the College Councils. SGA offers a tremendous learning experience, if those elected truly strive to represent their constituents.

While having experience in governing usually is preferred, most office holders would agree that understanding SGA procedures can be learned rather quickly. The best leaders are those who have a passion for what they are doing. Don't let your lack of know-how be the only excuse for not running.

If you do run, be aware of the tough task ahead. Most students either don't care about student government or disapprove of the job being done.

The next generation of leaders should not necessarily have solutions for all campus problems but should at least be willing to speak their minds.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds. To call the Fourum, dial 395-4444.

Racism is a serious issue, and whether or not you listen to rap music has nothing to do with your race.

How many days until spring break again?

Congratulations, K-State Collegian, on finally putting together a paper that's worth reading — from front page to back.

I don't mind DB92 playing rap music as long as they mix in some Beastie Boys, and maybe some Beck, and some Ice Cube, Ice Ice, Vanilla Ice, I mean.

I just really dug that "The Young and The Restless" show that you had on today. But, man, you might want to be doing a synopsis or commentary on "ER." It is moving.

K-State needs to follow the precedent set by Dartmouth College and abolish the greek system. They give the real students here a bad name.

Tragedy: When the Collegian addresses the death of a homosexual man for months, while the hometown 18-year-old dies on the football field and receives one picture. What's your agenda?

I'm paying Rec privilege fees. Why does that not include parking?

I'm calling in regards to the ad that the men of Alpha Tau Omega placed in the Collegian on Friday. Are they saying that the only women on K-State campus are sorority girls? Whatever.

I never used to listen to DB92. But now because of all the controversy about it, I listen to it just because it intrigues me.

KELLIE FARRELL/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dodging the BULLETS over Capitol Hill

The good news is the economy is strong.

The bad news is, because of the good economy, 81 percent of Americans did not care about the impeachment trial of President Clinton. They didn't watch any of the trial. They did not read about it in the papers. They ignored it and went about their business.

On Friday, President Clinton dodged a bullet fired from his own gun and the nation didn't even notice.

DAN THOMPSON

Allowing money to motivate our voting decisions is a dangerous precedent. It has happened before with horrific results, though not in this country until now.

People blindly follow Clinton in the same fashion that the Germans followed Adolf Hitler. In Germany, people were so terrified about the state of their depressed economy, they elected Hitler. Today, we are so pleased with the state of our economy, we let Clinton make a mockery of our judicial system.

People argue that most Germans did not know about the things Hitler was doing to the Jews. They should have known. Jewish people were disappearing never to be seen or heard from again. Similarly, Americans choose to ignore the damage Clinton has done — not only to the presidency but to our entire system of government.

Americans don't realize that the office of the president has been weakened. It no longer bothers us if we elect a person without ethics or values.

Americans would elect the devil himself if we thought he could better the economy.

Though Clinton has not gassed millions of people, his actions have hurt his office and the legislative branch. Clinton's approval ratings continue to soar, while the branches of our government erode.

Few have noticed that the members of Senate hurt the legislative branch by failing to uphold the Constitution. The Senators took an oath at the beginning of the trial swearing to be impartial jurors, but they wasted no time telling anyone who would listen that their minds were already set. They even suggested before the trial began that it not be conducted because two-thirds of the Senate would never vote to remove the president from office. They wouldn't vote to remove, regardless of the evidence, because it wasn't what the people wanted.

In the early days of our country, elected officials were considered trustees of the people. They didn't have polls and fax machines. People trusted their Congressmen to make the right decisions based on the Congressman's conscience. Today, we have the technology to make the decisions for our Congress people. Americans expect elected officials to do the will of their constituents. However, when the people aren't paying attention, it is the duty of our officials to become trustees and vote their conscience. Our Senators failed to do that.

Even Clinton supporters, the few who watched, sat in disbelief when they saw Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., vote "not proven." Clinton obviously lied under oath. Even the people that didn't follow the case know Clinton lied. There was nothing to prove. It was a fact.

Some things, like the strength of our nation, are more important than getting re-elected. The impeachment trial was one of those things.

The Senate's failure to punish the president also damaged the judicial branch. The president of the United States lied under oath and was not punished.

Americans can lie under oath without the fear of punishment. They won't think twice about following the fine example set by our president. Few have noted that our judicial system will no longer work.

The bullet Clinton dodged Feb. 12 is now speeding straight toward the backs of our heads. Hopefully, Americans will notice and duck out of its path before its too late.

College recruiting should not be limited to athletics; academics crucial, too

Universities would be improved if more emphasis was put on education

Welcome college fans and aficionados, you are listening to Cat Chat on 580 AM. I am, of course, Fletcher Jacobs, your resident recruiting guru, here to report on this year's crop of K-State recruits. Almost two whole weeks have passed since national signing day, and I've had plenty of time to sort through this wonderful chaos that is big time Division I recruiting. Tonight, the phone lines are open to answer any questions you have about this year's recruiting. The lines are already lighting up, so let's get to some callers. Hello caller, and welcome to Cat Chat.

Caller: Hey, what's going on? This is Chuck from Pomona. My question just deals with the overall recruiting. Who do you think had the No. 1 recruiting class?

Well, obviously, you have to look at the usual powers here. Your Stanfords, Dukes, MITs and Princetons all ranked high on everybody's lists. According to Billy Burton, the editor of the National Recruiting Adviser says for the second straight year, Harvard will take top billing. They signed four of Burton's Super Prep 10 including Ted Needhamer, Burton's No. 1 recruit. Needhamer just has such a great gift. With a 4.0 GPA, 36 ACT and 1600 SAT, he is the stuff deans and professors have dreams about at night. Needhamer, a graduate of a prep school back East, is a pre-med/pre-law student, so you know he will be able to jump in and contribute immediately. He had originally committed orally to Duke but changed his mind at the 11th hour. I've seen some film of him in class, and he is the real deal. Next caller.

Caller: This is Jarred from Oskaloosa. I just wanted to ask about the community-college transfers who we picked up this year. Our system has done a really good job in the past couple of years molding these fresh faces with college experience. They've really been able to come and contribute to the program. Who and what did we get this year?

Well Jarred, this year wasn't quite as strong for our community-college transfers. It is true that in the past, our school has done a real good job of evaluating talent and picking up the right pieces to the puzzle. This year, the numbers dropped off some, but we still got some quality. Look for two education majors, Desmond Goldsmith and Rebecca Johnson, both quality in-state recruits, to come in and really help out that department.

Caller: Paul from Salina. So, overall, how did we fare in state in our recruiting?

In the head-to-head battle with the rival Hawkers, I'd say we did fairly well. If you look at the position of engineering, we really dominated. Terry King and his people are really excited about Jim Pitts, a civil engineer who was on everybody's all-America list. When it came down to us and Texas A&M, he felt he needed to stay close to home. They really think he is going to be a name we are seeing on Dean's Honor Roll for years to come. Another engineer they are high on is T. J. Powell, a mechanical engineer whose SAT score was just phenomenal. Look for him in a couple of semesters.

One area we really got hit hard in was business. Yar Ebadi, the business dean, already is at work on this year's juniors to try and grab some early oral commitments. Line three, welcome to Cat Chat.

Caller: Hey there, Fletch, this is Matt from Seneca. I just wanted to know your personal feelings about the game of recruiting in general. I mean, we have all seen how recruiting violations have really tarnished the image of what used to be such a pure thing. Do you think that academic recruiting has gone too far?

Matt, your points are all very valid. From the moment these kids step on campus, they are just bombarded. Each school sends out pretty girls to give them tours, alumni trying to give some gifts under the table. Cars, computers and clothes are all items used by boosters to try and help lure bright minds to big universities. It has just become ridiculous. I mean, these are just 18-year-old kids after all. Schools will do whatever it takes to get the edge.

Plus, in today's society, you get on the Internet and have at your fingertips enough information and rankings about recruiting to make you foam at the mouth. We have to remember these are just kids trying to get an education.

Caller: This is Chris from Meriden. I was just wondering if the NCAA has handed down their sanctions from last year's recruiting fiasco with Sam Lloyd, that highly-touted community-college pharmacy transfer who supposedly received the car from a booster of the university.

Again, the ugly side of academic recruiting rears its head. As for this particular case, President Jon Wefald assured me he thought the NCAA would go lightly on us this time. It was our first such offense, and since we turned it in immediately, Lloyd might just be suspended for a semester.

Caller: Fletcher, this is Taylor from Ottawa. Should we be worried that, once again, we weren't ranked in anybody's top-25 recruiting classes? What is the deal?

You have to remember that recruiting is only a piece of the puzzle. So much goes into being a successful college — professors, improving a prospect once he steps on campus (classes and work ethic), and teamwork. Recruiting isn't an exact science by any means.

Welcome gang, thanks for listening. Join us next week as we discuss the loss of several of our journalism faculty because of its exodus to Oklahoma and what that did to recruiting. Until then, good night.

Veryl A. Switzer

Determination, Innovation & Dedication

Thanks Veryl, K-State Athletic Department

Veryl Switzer speaks to an audience of student athletes, friends and supporters at a reception honoring his 30 years of service to the university Monday night. Switzer, who was drafted fourth by the Green Bay Packers in 1953, holds the highest draft position of any K-State athlete. This week will honor Switzer and his contributions to K-State.

PRESIDENT, BLACK STUDENT UNION

Grateful, humble Switzer thanks crowd for support

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Surrounded by student athletes and associates who have played a significant role in his 30 years of service to the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, Veryl Switzer reflected on the celebration given in his honor Monday night at Bramlage Coliseum with the same grateful and humble attitude that has marked his character since he arrived in Manhattan as a student more than 40 years ago.

"I'm truly honored to be here and to be a part of this program," he said. "I'm so excited I don't know what to say."

The celebration held in the west concourse of the coliseum marked the beginning of a week-long commemoration of Switzer for his service and dedication to the university. The numerous athletes in attendance reflected the important role Switzer has played in the development and support of area youth.

"I came back to Manhattan in 1969 with the purpose of working with our young people," Switzer said. "I made a commitment, and that commitment was that if students get tired of me I'll leave, but I won't leave until that happens."

"It didn't happen, so I decided I'll leave anyway," he joked.

The commitment Switzer offered K-State spanned beyond athletics and carried into many student programs and organizations. Members of United Black Voices, the TRIO program and Black Student Union offered gifts and words of encouragement for Switzer and his dedication.

Brandon Clark, BSU president, praised Switzer for his involvement in the organization.

"Just a few weeks ago, the Black Student Union celebrated 30 years of being here on the campus of Kansas State University," Clark said. "Mr. Switzer has been a part of Black Student Union ever since it started. For that, we are truly grateful for all that you have done."

The countless lives touched by Switzer are a reflection of his undying interest and tireless dedication towards helping anyone in need.

Beginning his involvement with youth in one of Chicago's most racist neighborhoods, Switzer's optimistic attitude and selfless approach helped him overcome odds stacked high against him.

A firm believer in speaking through actions instead of words, Switzer said one principal's decision to give him a chance opened a window of opportunity.

"I think what she was trying to tell me is that, if you place confidence in people, you call upon them to get the thing done," he said. "If you find your supervisor is always on you, have faith and confidence, because they look for people who will do the job."

Athletic Director Max Urlick, who helped organize the event, agreed that Switzer's years of service have been about more than just shattering stereotypes.

"In seeing his impact on all of you, he not only knocked the barriers down, he built bridges," Urlick said.

The bridges that Veryl Switzer helped build still remain, as the speakers honoring one of K-State's finest reminded the audience.

Regardless of Switzer's suggestion that the celebrations on his behalf were too much, all agreed that one week of festivities wasn't nearly enough.

"I hope you enjoy all that this week has for you, because you are truly, truly deserving of it," Clark said.

Crew team finishes 3rd at meet

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's crew team took third place at the Midwest Indoor Rowing Championships on Feb. 6 in Lawrence, finishing only behind host school Kansas and Creighton University.

Head coach Jenny Hale said she was happy with the team's performance at its first meet of the spring racing schedule before it starts outdoor competition.

"I felt we did pretty good," Hale said. "About 55 percent of our athletes met or exceeded their personal goals. Considering we've only been training about four weeks, I thought we did very well."

Despite the productive finish, the Wildcats were not completely healthy going into the meet as several athletes were forced to sit out because of illness and injury.

"We had a couple people down the varsity level and several people down on the novice level due to either injuries or sickness," Hale said. "So, we didn't go in full strength, but considering that, I think we did a pretty good job."

Senior Jill Murphy, who has been with the team since it became a varsity sport, took the gold in the varsity lightweight competition with a time of 7:31.5.

"For Jill Murphy to win the light weight division, that's outstanding," Hale said.

Sophomore Laura Pavlyak placed third in the open weight division with a time of 7:22.8. Pavlyak walked on to the team last spring.

"She is really only in her third semester of rowing, so that is a good score for the lack of experience she has," Hale said.

Another sophomore, Emily Benz, placed sixth in the open weight division with a time of 7:24.

At the novice level, freshman Josie McLellan placed third in the novice open weight division.

The meet was the final competition before the beginning of the outdoor season. The team practiced outside on the water for the first time Monday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

"Indoor rowing started as something to liven up the winter training. Now it has grown into a worldwide competition," Hale said. "This meet puts a closer on the winter season. It gets us fired up for the spring season."

Coach Hale is looking forward to the start of the spring season, she said.

"We are technically strong team, but we have got a lot of work to do," she said.

The outdoor season kicks off with a home match at Tuttle Creek on March 13 against Creighton.

Wildcats have strong showing at track meets

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcat track team had one last chance to fine-tune its technique this weekend when part of the team traveled to Lawrence, Kan., while two women's distance runners went to Norman, Okla.

The Lawrence meet was a non-scored meet, but offered the Cats the chance to strive for better times and gain confidence as the season nears conclusion.

Highlights of the meet included Kimela West, who earned a personal record with first place in the 200 meter and first place in 55 meter; Ashlie Kinton, first in the 3,000 meter; Renetta Seiler and Anna Whitman, first and second in the women's weight throw; Christine Ingram, first in triple jump; Brandon Jessop, first in the mile; Aaron Lockett, first in the 55 meter and 200 meter; Terresha Terosset, first in 400 meter; and Darcy Morris, first in 600 yard.

"It was a good meet, for the most part, for the people we sent there," Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"The idea was that it would just be an opportunity for people to just have a single quality effort or to run a race if they hadn't run very frequently," he said, "and there were some good performances, so it was good."

Several runners had personal records, which Rovelto said was important to see because it tells him his athletes are at the stage they should be.

"Basically, physically they're where we want them to be," Rovelto said. "You know when you've got people having personal records in a relatively low-key meet, you know that going into the conference meet they're going to be a little bit sharper and better rested, so it's a good sign."

Emily Diederich and Amanda Crouse, 800 meter runners, went to Oklahoma to get a better feel for the kind of competition they will face in the near future. Diederich won the race.

"Emily won with a time of 2:08.46, which is a little better than she had done previously," Rovelto said. "Amanda ran 2:15.10, so for Emily it was a good run, for Amanda that's about what she'd done previously."

While Diederich led the race from beginning to finish, Rovelto said he did not anticipate this again in the Big 12

Cats lose to Clemson in 3-game series

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team was swept by the No. 22 Clemson Tigers in a three-game series over the weekend to drop its record to 1-5.

The Wildcats dropped the first game on Friday, 10-7, after almost coming back from an 8-0 deficit. Clemson scored eight runs quickly, with three in the first inning, four in the third and one in the fifth.

Senior starter Brandon Peck picked up the loss, allowing six earned runs in three innings.

The Wildcats lost the second game of the series on Saturday 10-4 after building a 3-0 lead.

Sophomore first baseman Mark English doubled in junior second baseman Chad Tabor, and freshman center fielder Collin Yoachim scored on an RBI groundout by Boyer in the third inning to give the Cats a 2-0 lead, before the Tigers answered in fifth by scoring four runs on senior starting pitcher Derek Anderson.

Clemson prevailed again in the last game of the series, defeating K-State 11-3 on Sunday.

The Tigers put the Wildcats away early, scoring nine runs in the first four innings, all of which came off of junior starter Jason Wells, whose record dropped to 1-1.

Clemson's pitching staff held the Wildcats' bats in check for most of the game, allowing only six hits and two earned runs.

English extended his hitting streak to nine games, dating back to last season, with his single in the second inning, while sophomore center fielder Michael Colosimo was the only Wildcat to have more than one hit in the game, finishing 2-2 with an RBI.

The Wildcats return from the road to face the York (Neb.) Panthers at 3 p.m. today at Eisenhower Field.

Hard-working Rodman ready to play, but is L.A. ready for Rodman's antics?

CRANE

Despite the fresh wounds still healing from the NBA lockout, there is an interesting story in the depths of disarray, and his name is Dennis.

Dennis Rodman, "the Worm," is shopping for a team. He was rejected by Miami and snubbed by Orlando. In his quest for sand and surf, his focus turned to the top of many rumor lists of his possible destination, the City of Angels, Los Angeles.

Rodman is expected to sign with Los Angeles today in time for L.A.'s Tuesday night game against Charlotte.

Is this a mistake for Los Angeles? It could be. Rodman is a win or lose kind of guy. He lost in San Antonio where he clashed badly with his coach and teammates. He won in Chicago where Phil Jackson "let Dennis be Dennis." Although Rodman might not have hung out with the boys, he did get the job done and has the rings to show it.

Rodman isn't all championships and heroics either. He's spit on fans, kicked a cameraman in the groin and seems to have a fancy for women's clothing and day-glo hair. Not to forget the tattoos or skipping practice to wrestle with "Hollywood Hogan." I can't leave out his book and movie deals or his shotgun marriage to Carmen Electra.

Although his actions might suggest him to be, Rodman is far from a joke. He has been on five of the last 10 NBA championship teams. He averages 13 rebounds a game. He is a defensive stalwart. He antagonizes opposing teams with his antics. When he gets serious on the court, good things happen.

The foreboding thing about Los Angeles is not necessarily the team but the setting. Is L.A. ready for Rodman? Or is L.A. what Rodman needs? You can switch those around any way you want, but you will still get the same question mark answer.

Is L.A. the right place for Rodman so he can jet over to his movie or television sets whenever he pleases? Will the trendy bars and celebrity parties be too much for Dennis and his outlandish duds to resist? Probably. But the rumor around the league is that Dennis is ready to settle down a bit. Usually what Rodman says is true, but it is the people close to him that are saying he's burnt out on partying and late-night carousing. The truth lies in The Worm's eye.

The so-called "No-Limit Soldier," Shaquille O'Neal, said he wanted a "thug" on his side to help him gain a championship. I don't know if I'd call Rodman a thug. I'd call Lattrell Sprewell a thug but not Rodman. Rodman is more of a work-horse. Despite what he says, and if you look past all the hype, he works hard on the court. Not too many players dive for loose balls and get 20 boards a game frequently.

No one thought Rodman would fit in at Chicago, either. Looking back on the Bulls, it's a miracle he fit in with Michael Jordan, Scottie Pippen and the rest.

Now Rodman might have to try and forge relationships with some even bigger egos than his own: Shaq, Eddie Jones and Kobe Bryant, along with some court-side egos like Jack Nicholson and Farrah Fawcett.

Lakers owner Jerry West has assembled some of the best talent in the league, but he has a double-edged sword with Rodman. He might either distract his team more or use Rodman as the ox to pull his team past the Utah Jazz in the Western Conference.

Rodman's need for late-night outings can be easily satisfied in L.A. and Las Vegas is only a short jaunt across the desert. It seems that L.A. could be the best possible place for Rodman to finish his career. A storybook ending to Rodman's storied career.

From a small college in Oklahoma, to a five-time NBA champion and then maybe a couple of championships in L.A., some unbelievable parties and finally a divorce from Mrs. Rodman-Electra that will send him into financial ruin (in which he is reported to be).

No matter what Rodman chooses to do, you can bet that it may be the only thing in the NBA worth watching this season.

CLIF PALMBERG/KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

UPC offers 4 weeks of salsa, merenge lessons

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The Union Program Council Multicultural Committee is providing K-State students with a chance to brush up on their dancing skills through a series of four mambo and merenge lessons.

The dance lessons began on Sunday and continue for the next three Sundays. Participants will gather in the K and S Ballrooms of the K-State Student Union for instructions on tripping the light fantastic — and avoiding tripping over their partners.

Although instructor Josh Hernandez has never taught through UPC before, he might be a familiar name among local dance professionals. While teaching classes through the K-State Ballroom Club, Hernandez spends his spare time competing in ballroom and swing dance contests around the country.

"Josh is really good to work with, and we hear so many good things about him, so we just decided to have lessons this semester," said Muriel Riedel, junior in education and UPC Multicultural Committee chairmen.

The mambo and the merenge are fast-paced Latin dances that have survived many generations, with elements contributed by several cultures. Hernandez said that as people moved from place to place, their dancing took on the flavor of their new home.

"Both dances have European, African and Caribbean-Indian influences," he said.

Merenge will be introduced to members of the class, but Hernandez said his main focus in the class would be mambo.

Hernandez said he is especially excited about teaching his class a move called the "rueda," which means "wheel" in Spanish. The rueda can be seen in last year's romantic comedy "Dance With Me," starring Vanessa Williams as a contestant in a Latin dance competition.

When dancing the rueda, couples form a large circle around the dance floor, and men spin their partners in a wheel around them. After twirling around their partner for eight counts, the women are passed on to a different partner without missing a beat in the music.

While the rueda might sound a little difficult at first, Hernandez said he would make sure his students understood the different elements of the dance.

"You're going to find this is a piece of cake," he said. "I really break things down for my students."

Michael Bennett, adviser for the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said he was first introduced to the world of dance by his mother, a member of the San Francisco Ballet.

Bennett, who assists the class, danced at the University of California at Berkeley and various places around Illinois, Georgia and Texas. He has been teaching ballroom dancing through UFM, and the Division of Continuing Education since 1988 and was even featured in last semester's Winter Dance.

The cost of the lessons are $10 per person and $15 per couple, but Bennett said participants will find the dance lessons would be worth the cost. Those involving Latin moves would be especially beneficial, he said, because it would not only be romantic for couples but also beneficial for single students.

"When you see an attractive man or woman, this is the best way to get close to them," he said. "Being able to hold another person and move as one is a great feeling."

Hernandez said those students who might shy away from dancing out of embarrassment need not worry.

"After four lessons, I will make sure that people will feel comfortable going out to the Latin dances around Manhattan," Hernandez said.

Three couples learn to dance merenge and mambo style Sunday night in the K-State Student Union. The lessons are taught by Josh Hernandez.

'Payback' blends sinister action, comedy in remake

By RYAN DOOM
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

It has been quite some time since audiences have seen their favorite Australian actor (next to Paul Hogan) in a down and dirty role.

In "Payback," Mel Gibson does his best to turn himself into a loner criminal with a million-dollar smile.

Gibson stars as a professional robber known only by his last name, Porter. He is a man of little emotion and lives his life smoking one cigarette after another while spending his time with the scum of society.

The film opens with a drunken surgeon pulling slugs from Porter's back. After a few flashbacks, Porter and Val (Gregg Henry), an up-and-coming gangster, come up with a scheme to get a briefcase, supposedly containing a few hundred thousand dollars from an Asian mafia group.

After a spectacular car wreck, they finally get the briefcase, only to discover it has a mere $140,000 in it.

On top of that, Porter's wife and Val have planned to keep the money for themselves.

Porter's wife shoots him in the back five times, proving that Porter made a mistake in putting his trust in his devious wife. Val, meanwhile, needs the $140,000 so he can join a criminal underworld known as the Outfit.

Once Porter is revived, he goes on a rampage, wanting his share of the money back. That gives him a good excuse to threaten, kidnap and kill anyone who stands in his way.

Porter has to go through everyone, from petty drug dealers, to dirty cops, to criminal underworld lords to get his money back. He makes it his sole mission in life to find Val again and get back his half of the money.

Probably one of the best elements of "Payback" is that it blends both the dark action and a little comedy well. It is reminiscent of Elmore Leonard's "Get Shorty" and "Out of Sight," and there is even a torture scene that might remind audiences of "Reservoir Dogs."

Even though the film is not completely original, the film itself is a remake of 1967's "Point Blank," it still is fun to discover a world few people experience.

This film knows how to deliver, making it a roller coaster ride that doesn't let up and letting Gibson be as gritty and funny as always.

Rhythm, blues band provides welcome diversion from work

By GIGI MCCALL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

As part of its current tour of U.S. colleges and universities, Imani, an all-female music group, will perform at 8 p.m. tonight in Union Station.

The concert is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Multicultural and Eclectic Entertainment committees.

Admission to the event is free.

Imani, which hails from Pennsylvania, performs music that has a mixture of influences, including rhythm and blues, gospel and jazz. The group performs most of its pieces a cappella.

The group has opened for numerous well-known performers, including Gerald Levert, Tony Rich, Boyz II Men, Bill Bellamy, TLC, Regina Bell and Bill Cosby.

Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said she saw Imani perform at the National Association for Campus Activities in Omaha, Neb., a conference that showcases various activities and entertainment acts for college organizations. It was there that she decided to book Imani to perform at K-State.

"They have great voices and choreography," McBride said. "They remind me a lot of En Vogue."

Alex Stucky, senior in statistics and UPC Eclectic Entertainment chairman, said he knew when he saw Imani perform at the conference that the group would be received well at the K-State campus.

"I thought Imani was a group K-State students would really enjoy," he said. "Their talent was very impressive."

Stucky said a main goal of UPC is to provide a diverse range of entertainment to students and the rhythm and blues style of Imani was part of that diversity.

"We haven't featured a jazz or rhythm and blues group for a while," Stucky said.

"That's not something that comes around often."

McBride said the concert will be a welcome diversion from schoolwork.

"It will provide students with a release, something fun to do in between all that homework," she said.

"I THOUGHT IMANI WAS A GROUP K-STATE STUDENTS WOULD REALLY ENJOY. THEIR TALENT IS REALLY IMPRESSIVE."

attacks on our forces or on neighboring countries that our response would be swift and sure," said Albright, who is with Clinton on his trip to Mexico.

Ramadan made his remarks the same day Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz conducted talks with Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit in Ankara. Aziz went to Turkey to try to persuade the Turkish government to halt the overflights from Incirlik base. Ecevit, however, insisted that use of the base to patrol the zone would continue.

Also Monday, U.S. warplanes attacked Iraqi defense sites in northern Iraq, the Defense Department said in Washington, D.C. The planes returned safely to Incirlik, according to the Defense Department.

The Iraqi government said in a statement that allied planes also had carried out attacks in the southern no-fly zone, killing five civilians and injuring another 22. The U.S. statement made no mention of strikes in the south, and the Iraqi claims could not be independently confirmed.

The no-fly zones were set up after the 1991 Gulf War to prevent Iraqi aircraft from attacking Kurdish rebels in the north and Shiite Muslims in the south of the country.

Iraq has never accepted the validity of the zones, which were created by the United States, Britain and France and are not authorized by a specific U.N. Security Council resolution. France later withdrew its participation in the enforcement of the zones.

The United States said Iraq has violated the zones 90 times since it began challenging them in December. U.S. and British planes have retaliated by attacking more than 40 Iraqi air defense sites. Iraq said at least 32 people have been killed in these attacks.

In Kuwait on Monday, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said the Iraqi threats reflect Baghdad's "aggressive intention toward its neighbors."

Iraq's warning on Sunday was a "direct and serious threat to Kuwait's security and sovereignty," the spokesman told the official Kuwait News Agency.

In Ankara, although Ecevit made clear earlier Monday that U.S. and British planes would continue to be allowed to use Incirlik to patrol northern Iraq, he distanced his nation from the American interest in overthrowing Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Turkey fears attempts to remove Hussein could lead to chaos and division in Iraq. "For us the problem is not Saddam Hussein," Ecevit reported after meeting with Aziz.

"Saddam Hussein is the concern of the Iraqi people, and it might be the problem of the United States or other states," Ecevit said. "For us, the problem is to prevent Iraq's division."

He said he told Aziz the mission was operating under the strict control of Turkish officers and that U.S. jets were only striking at Iraqi defense sites when attacked or targeted.

one-quarter of the union's net worth, with the court in preparation of a final decision on the fine on Wednesday. He also ordered union president Rich LaVoy and vice president Brian Mayhew to remit a total of $15,000.

Nearly 6,000 flights have been canceled since the work action began, costing American between $67 million and $90 million, according to Chris Chiames, a spokesman for AMR Corp. The final total has not been projected.

American will see more revenue reductions, since it plans to reduce its schedule 2 percent in the spring, or about 45-50 flights a day, because officials do not believe pilots will volunteer for extra overtime.

The dispute is over how Reno Air pilots have been paid since AMR took control of the low-cost carrier last December. AMR wants to pay the pilots higher rates as they are retrained, but the union believes their contract guarantees the pilots are paid more from the purchase date.

Some Reno pilots' pay is half the $164,000 a year that an experienced American pilot is paid. AMR said the pilot union's demands to add Reno pilots to the higher pay scale quickly would cost as much as $50 million this year.

Both sides said the sickout had not changed their original negotiating positions.

So far, neither the company or union has requested a federal mediator or binding arbitration in the dispute.

in. She worked to decrease the boarding rates in the residence halls and worked on a cooperation-living plan that had students pay a set fee, which was offset with a certain number of work hours in the hall.

Conference Meet this weekend at Ahearn Field House.

He said that was not really how runners should run but was the way that particular meet worked out.

Rovelto, unlike many coaches, focuses not only on wins in duals and triangulars but on the wins in the end, he said.

The women's team is ranked fourth in the NCAA going into the conference meet, behind one Big 12 team — Nebraska, ranked No. 2, which handed them their first loss this season.

Also ahead of the women are the University of Florida at No. 1, and the University of South Carolina at No. 3.

Three Big 12 teams are ahead of the 29th-ranked men's team. These teams are Nebraska, at No. 5; Texas, at No. 6 and Kansas at No. 10.

Tuition increase proposed to fund Hale Library

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the Privilege Fee Committee's rejection of a student privilege fee for Hale Library funding, two new proposals are being researched by the committee and Student Governing Association members.

The first one was to increase the general tuition by charging students $1 per credit hour. The state of Kansas then would match this amount or exceed it. The second proposal is to create a separate library fee that students would pay for at the beginning of the semester.

"A lot of students don't see the difference. Money is money," Privilege Fee Chair Jeff Meder said. "But to us, it is a big deal. It is a state obligation versus a campus obligation."

Meder said he prefers the separate library fee because a general increase in tuition might not always benefit the library.

"There is no commitment on the part of the state that the money will always go to the library," Meder said.

It is unlikely the Kansas Board of Regents will approve an increase in tuition unless the University of Kansas increases its tuition too, Meder said.

Another option is to write a separate privilege fee. The first privilege fee was rejected by the committee, but any of the 62 student senators can write another bill and send it to the Senate. It then would be referred to the committee for revision and then sent back to the Senate. Meder said one of the difficulties is approving a fee, which requires a two-thirds vote.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said this library fee is much needed.

"It's an everyday thing that people don't find what they need," Hobrock said. "We have no adequate number of books, subscriptions, staff or equipment. The rate of borrowing has increased dramatically, and our ability to reciprocate is declining."

The separate library fee option is more probable than others because two other universities will have to approve this proposal — Wichita State University and KU, Provost James Coffman said.

Student Body President Tracey Mann said these two universities have not been contacted, although when they have met in the past, library fees always have been discussed.

"Library funding is one of the issues we are most concerned about. But the issue is, how are we going to fund it?" Mann said.

Other options include getting money from faculty grants, from which the university gets a certain percent, or getting money from the Kansas Legislature. Meder said the committee also was thinking about either making a one-time gift and give the library its reserve accounts at the end of the year or starting an endowment that earns interest.

If the proposal of adding an extra $1 to tuition were taken seriously, the resolution would go through Senate to get feedback from students. It then would go to the regents, who in either April,

May or June would present the issue to the governor. The governor would make his decision in September, and the Legislature would review it next year.

"I think it's the solution that the students seemed to prefer because the privilege fee wasn't the appropriate fee," Hobrock said.

Hobrock said it would be faster with student fees to improve the library's funding situation, but inflation is covered by the state and the university, and money from the foundation and endowments will allow them to make some progress.

"You could say we've been delayed for 50 years, and that's why we're behind. It's hard to make sense out of a case like this," Hobrock said.

Switzer lauded for work as administrator

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State administrator Veryl Switzer, who earned the nickname "Mr. Perpetual Motion" during his days as a Wildcat football All-American in the 1950s, will bring his 30-year career to a close by retiring later this year.

President Jon Wefald said Switzer has embodied the qualities of K-State in everything he has done.

"I think he's done an excellent job for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics in a whole range of ways, and I think he's been excellent for Kansas State University itself," Wefald said. "He represents the university at its very best."

With Switzer's background as a man of many talents on the gridiron, he also has excelled in many fields during his tenure at K-State, said Athletic Director Max Urlick.

"There's no job too little for Veryl to try to undertake," Urlick said. "He's a great team player and makes a contribution in other areas of the athletic department than just his area of specialty. He is always willing to take on more responsibility."

Following the completion of his professional football career and 10 years on the Chicago Board of Education, Switzer was lured back to Manhattan in 1969 to assist then-football coach Vince Gibson.

Though the job was enough to bring Switzer back to K-State, he refused to allow it to keep him for long.

"I decided three to four years would probably be the maximum I would stay in one job," Switzer said. "I lived out that creed. I may have had 10 to 12 roles in my professional experiences."

True to his plan, by 1973 Switzer had moved on to a position as associate dean and assistant vice president for university minority affairs.

During the next 15 years, Switzer had a variety of job titles in the areas of minority and student affairs, and it was in those areas that some feel he accomplished the most.

"He has been one of the cornerstones in terms of diversity at this university," Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost for Diversity and Dual Career Development, said.

"He is a person who will stand on his convictions and his beliefs and for those things he considers to be right in terms of making the university a more inclusive place."

Switzer counts his work in multicultural affairs among his proudest achievements.

"I feel good about participating in such a way that brought about institutional change in dealing with non-traditional students," Switzer said. "I'd like to think that's something that will last a lifetime."

Switzer shifted the balance of his duties back toward athletics in 1988, when he accepted the position of associate athletics director. Urlick said Switzer played perhaps his most vital role as a mentor for student-athletes.

"The thing I like about him is his complete devotion to the student-athletes," Urlick said.

"I think he has excelled in the nurturing and mentoring and problem-solving that confronts many students as they negotiate the problems of a college career."

Wefald said, Switzer's prodding has led many former student athletes back to K-State to complete their degrees.

"The other day, he had taken [former K-State

K-State students spend time on ergometers Tuesday evening at the K-State Student Union, participating in the Row for Humanity event. The event, which required participants to row for an hour, raised money for the crew teams as well as for Habitat for Humanity.

courtyard CREW

Crew team, Habitat for Humanity join for rowing fund-raiser in Union Working out isn't just good for your body. K-State's men's and women's crew teams, along with Habitat for Humanity, are rowing to raise money for their cause.

Last year was their first Row for Humanity event. They hope to raise $12,000 this year, of which 15 percent will be given to Habitat for Humanity. The rest will be divided evenly between the men's and women's teams. Habitat for Humanity, however, will get to keep whatever money it raises itself.

Seiji Ikeda, senior in graphic design and chairman for this event, is also the Habitat for Humanity secretary.

"We were just hanging around the house and were thinking of a way to raise money for the rowing program," Ikeda said. "We chose Habitat for Humanity because they had similar needs as us — money. And we liked the social stigma attached to it."

Jenny Hale, K-State women's crew coach, said the fund-raiser gives back to the community and is also an opportunity to show people how to row.

"We chose Habitat for Humanity because we thought they had similar values to ours," Hale said. "It seemed like a really good pairing, since we both use teamwork to accomplish our goals."

Some of the Habitat for Humanity members who rowed last year ended up joining the rowing program. There are also high school students who row with K-State's teams. Everyone who participates this year gets a certain amount of money for each 100 meters rowed in an hour.

"It's really fun, but it hurts. Our practices are more broken up," said Bryan Stork, junior in biology and pre-med and a K-State rower. "Basically, I'm just trying to beat my teammates who are also on the team."

Although the event is only in its second year, Ikeda said he is considering making some changes.

"There was some talk about making the event 24 hours long. The challenge of whether or not you can do it is more appealing," Ikeda said.

Jill Murphy, senior in nutrition and exercise science and a women's crew team member, said this won't be much of a challenge for her.

"I don't expect to break any records," she said. "I'll just get a good workout for an hour."

Proposal would require registration tags for kegs

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Teen-agers at keg parties long have been a headache for law-enforcement officers trying to stop underage drinking. A Senate committee on Tuesday heard testimony but did not act on a bill designed to put a crimp in the partying.

The bill, promoted by Attorney General Carla Stovall, would require retail liquor dealers selling beer in containers of more than four gallons to attach registration tags to them and keep records of those making the purchases.

Some opponents said such records could be compared to the lists kept of suspected communists in the 1950s and anti-war protesters in the 1960s.

Coffey County Sheriff Randy Rogers told the Federal and State Affairs Committee that when officers raid a keg party of underage drinkers, it's often impossible to determine who brought the keg, which usually is eight or 16 gallons.

"The party of choice is a keg party, and nobody knows where it came from. A keg fairy must have dropped it off," said Rogers, prompting laughter in the committee room.

Assistant Attorney General Jane Nohr said, "Keg registration would allow law-enforcement officials to easily determine who purchased and provided the keg to underage individuals."

She said one survey of 98 law-enforcement agencies in Kansas showed that 71 percent said keg parties are a problem in their areas. She said 78 of the agencies estimated a total of some 700 keg parties occurred last year.

Sen. Rip Gooch, D-Wichita, questioned whether keg registration would do any good.

"What difference is there in drinking from a four-gallon container or four one-gallon containers?" Gooch said. "What keeps them from buying in cans or bottles? The bill doesn't have a solid foundation."

Jim Conant, Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control director, said requiring someone to show identification before purchasing a keg "should cause the individual to think twice if it is their intent to pass the beer along to minors."

Besides, he added, the price of a 16-gallon keg is about $70, compared to paying around $115 for the same quantity in cans or bottles.

Speaking against the bill was Kansas Beer Wholesalers Association executive director Neal Whitaker, who compared the registration to the 1950s and 1960s lists.

"This amounts to an invasion of privacy of law-abiding adults who consume a legal product at wedding receptions, family reunions, Super Bowl parties or summer holiday events in the backyard," Whitaker said.

U.S. doubts Iraq's attack capability

By ROBERT BURNS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Iraq's threats against Turkey, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia for supporting recent U.S. air attacks are being taken seriously, but there is little chance Iraq's depleted air force could launch attacks deep into neighboring territory, a Defense Department official said Tuesday.

"It's a sign of Saddam Hussein's desperation and isolation that Iraq is making such threats," said Kenneth Bacon, spokesman for Defense Secretary William Cohen. "I think the threats will get him nowhere."

Bacon said Iraq could try three ways to carry out its threats: fire Scud missiles, attack by air with planes or conduct terrorist raids. "All of these would be difficult, given the circumstances that Iraq faces today," Bacon said, referring to the deterioration of its military since the 1991 Persian Gulf War, the effect of the U.N. economic embargo and the strength of U.S. forces in the area that could retaliate.

Iraq's state-controlled news media warned U.S. allies Tuesday they will pay a high price for being host of American and British warplanes that patrol no-fly zones over Iraq. The planes have attacked Iraqi air defense installations almost daily in recent weeks in what the Pentagon calls self defense.

Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan said Monday that Baghdad would attack Incirlik Air Base in south-central Turkey — used by U.S. and British warplanes — if the jets continue patrolling Iraqi skies. It was the first time in years Iraq has threatened to attack its northern neighbor.

"Whether or not he means this threat to be

Hardware failure causes Internet, e-mail problems

A hardware failure made some Internet and e-mail access unavailable Tuesday on campus.

There was a malfunction in a router that carries Internet traffic to Internet 1 sites, which are commercial sites. Internet 2 sites, which include research institutions and some universities, such as K-State, were unaffected.

A staff member from the Lawrence-based Kansas Research and Education Network, the organization handling the problem, will drive to Manhattan to replace the router.

"They still believe there's a problem with the router and there is an overnight shipment coming in," Richard Becker, administrator of Computing and Network Services, said.

The same World Wide Web sites and e-mail addresses will be unavailable while the router is replaced. CNS is unsure when the part will be changed, but it hopes to give a two-hour notice before the replacement.

"Hopefully it will be controlled where we can warn people," Jay Alloway, assistant director of CNS, said.

The part should arrive today. CNS assisted KANREN fix the problem by providing remote access and resetting the system. Becker said hardware problems are unusual on campus.

"There are times that creep up when there might be a circuit problem, but I can't say there has been a hardware failure that I can remember," he said.

SGA offers online course information for next fall

A service created by the Student Governing Association to give students information about large, lecture-style classes is now available online in time for fall enrollment.

The Course Information Program, which has been a work-in-progress for about three years, has a World Wide Web site that will list the surveyed courses and post the results. The classes surveyed meet general education requirements and are 100 to 200 level courses.

"CIP is for students to look up information about their classes before they enroll," said Andy Macklin, student body vice president and committee chairman.

Graduate assistant Patricia Marsh is posting the course information on the site. There are five classes posted now, but Marsh said she expects to have 65 classes online before enrollment.

"For each class, they will get a general listing of information, like who's teaching it, how many were originally enrolled and professors' e-mail addresses," Marsh said.

A survey of 12 multiple choice questions will ask students about the classes. For each question, the four possible answers will be posted for each course and teacher and students' answers will be provided. The questionnaires are similar to the teacher evaluations given at the end of each semester.

CIP, which is funded and managed by the Office of Student Activities and Services, began in fall 1997. The committee conducted pilots to develop good questions to put on questionnaires.

CIP also has plans for expansion. "Next school year we would want to expand it," Marsh said. "Eventually all classes and all levels would be surveyed."

Injured Leawood woman doesn't remember attack

LEAWOOD, Kan. — The elderly woman beaten with a baseball bat in an attack that left her husband dead doesn't remember the attack, relatives say.

Marguerite Bacher-Kubik, 77, was in fair condition at a hospital Monday night, after surgery on a knee and hand earlier in the day. She has more than 200 stitches in her head. Three fingers on her right hand and two on her left were broken, and part of her left kneecap was shattered.

Bacher-Kubik and her husband, Lawrence Kubik, also 77, were beaten Feb. 4 at their suburban Kansas City, Kan., home, and Kubik died two days later. Francis P. Doyle, 79, of Prairie Village, Kan., is charged with first-degree murder, attempted first-degree murder and aggravated burglary.

A nephew, Allen Cloud of Overland Park, Kan., said doctors reported that Bacher-Kubik is doing well. He said she would have had surgery earlier, but it was delayed last week because of pneumonia.

Cloud said he and his brother told her last week that her husband was dead. He said she wanted to go to the funeral but that the family isn't sure if she really understands what has happened.

The couple married in November. They graduated from high school together at Caldwell, Kan., in 1939, and met again at a school reunion last year.

Kurdish rebel leader faces death for guerrilla warfare

ANKARA, Turkey — Kurdish rebel leader Abdullah Ocalan's international quest for asylum ended Tuesday after Turkey's prime minister announced that Ocalan had been brought here to face justice.

"We had promised that the state would catch him. We have kept our promise," Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit said.

"He will pay the price of his accounts to the independent Turkish courts," he said.

Ocalan's capture is a victory for Turkey, which wants to prosecute him for waging a 14-year guerrilla war for autonomy that claimed tens of thousands of lives.

He faces the death penalty if convicted.

Relatives of soldiers who died in the war poured into cemeteries after learning of Ocalan's arrest.

We have waited for this day all along," the Anatolia agency quoted Emine Eris as saying. "We won't cry today. It is our day of celebration."

Ecevit did not say when Turkey would put Ocalan (pronounced OH'-jah-lan) on trial. Ocalan was once tried in absentia, but a verdict was never issued.

Ocalan, 49, who dropped from sight after leaving Rome in January, was brought to Turkey today after surfacing in Kenya, Ecevit said.

Ecevit said his capture was the result of a 12-day covert operation but gave no details. He did not say where Ocalan was being held.

Private ATV television said the Kurdish leader had been imprisoned on the tiny, virtually uninhabited island of Imrali in the Marmara Sea.

Ocalan's arrest sparked Kurdish demonstrations across Europe, with protesters storming Greek diplomatic compounds.

French insurance program to sue tobacco companies

SAINT-NAZAIRE, France — A local branch of the state health insurance program said Tuesday that it is preparing a suit against four tobacco companies for up to $90 million, blaming them for smoking-related diseases.

The lawsuit would be a first in France where smoking remains widely tolerated and socially acceptable.

The big tobacco companies in the United States have agreed to pay $246 billion over 25 years to settle claims for the government's costs for treating sick smokers.

The U.S. Justice Department is considering filing a similar suit against the tobacco companies.

The social security office in this coastal city will sue tobacco companies Philip Morris, Rothmans, R.J. Reynolds and the French company Seita.

The insurance agency said it hopes to recover the cost of treating the 500 people afflicted with smoking-related illnesses in the Saint-Nazaire area, on France's Atlantic coast.

"Smoking has a huge impact on the health of a person. One in two smokers will die from tobacco-related causes, and half of those will die before the age of 69," Guy Couillaud, president of social security branch, said. "We believe that tobacco is a highly dangerous substance."

French tobacco industry officials dismissed the action as "a local attempt to apply American judicial concepts ... in a totally different context."

"This is the latest step in vilifying smokers and the tobacco industry, which is a perfectly legal enterprise," said Jean-Paul Truchot, spokesman for the Center for Documentation and Information on Tobacco that represents the tobacco industry.

The lawsuit is to be filed in Saint-Nazaire by the end of March.

Heinrich, Eckert announce candidacy

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Realistic issues designed with students in mind are what running mates Jason Heinrich and Gabe Eckert are focusing on in their campaign for student body president and vice president.

Heinrich, senior in industrial engineering and Eckert, senior in agricultural journalism, announced their campaign, "Designed With You In Mind" Tuesday at the clock tower south of Hale Library.

Heinrich and Eckert talked about the four issues they will concentrate on if elected. They said they plan to restructure finals week to give students a weekend break in the middle of their finals.

"You'd have a few finals before the weekend and a few finals after the weekend. The two-day weekend would give you a little break in between," Heinrich said.

They said they want to expand the uses of the dining hall meal plans to allow students to eat at the K-State Student Union with the plans.

"If you have a class during the day and you can't make it back to the residence hall to eat, you can have more flexibility to stay on campus and use your money more wisely," Eckert said.

They also said they want to make the 100-percent refund period for dropping classes longer to give students more time to decide whether they want to drop a class.

Their fourth issue is improving World Wide Web services for students. Heinrich and Eckert said they plan to make voting and book buying available to students through KATS in addition to enrolling, which is now available online.

"I think we've put together solid issues — some issues that are going to affect everybody and that are doable," Heinrich said.

Heinrich has had experience as the K-State Student Body Ambassador, president of Blue Key Senior Honorary, vice president of the Interfraternity Council and member of the Student Alumni Board. Eckert has had several positions in student government including his current position as Student Senate chair, allocations chair and Student Governing Association treasurer.

"We've put together a good team," Heinrich said. "We have a wide range of experience and knowledge about campus issues."

Heinrich and Eckert met each other through mutual friends, and they recently decided they would make a good team because of their different backgrounds.

"Jason and I bring a lot of diverse experiences. We don't come from the same background. That's going to allow us to affect every student on this campus," Eckert said.

They said they received a lot of support from their friends as they announced their candidacy, and they hope to include their friends and all students in the issues on which they're concentrating.

"We're really focused on the team approach," Heinrich said. "It's not just my idea or Gabe's idea. We're going to try to involve all the students on campus."

After their announcement, Heinrich and Eckert had a kickoff gathering in the Union with the band Last Call.

City Commissioners award grant, loan to new business

■ Economic development funds are source of money for Light Solutions Inc.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another applicant came away with economic development funds in Tuesday night's City Commission meeting, but not without expectations from commissioners for higher wages over time.

After a 7-1 approval by the Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund Advisory Board, Light Solutions Inc. President Gene Kleffman requested final approval by the commission for a $50,000 grant and a $250,000 loan. After debate over both the merit of his product and the wages suggested, the commission voted 4-1 to award Kleffman the funds.

Under Kleffman's proposal, he would establish Light Solutions in a 20,000-square-foot office in Manhattan's Corporate Technology Park and establish 24 full-time equivalent jobs in the first year.

The MEDOFAB money would go to Bradbury Corporation for a down payment on equipment for Kleffman's factory. The corporation will turn out his patented light fixtures, which are proven to expend 66-percent less energy and create 30- to 50-percent less heat than typical lamps. A previous try to market the fixtures failed years earlier when older equipment required 30 minutes to manufacture each fixture. With the newer machinery, six could be made every minute, he said.

"So I have a superior product at the same cost. The biggest killer of lamps is the heat, not the use of it," Kleffman said.

In addition, if Kleffman and his staff can create 50 full-time equivalent jobs after five years, up to $50,000 will be forgiven from the loan amount. The loan has a 3.5-percent interest rate for 10 years.

There were few objections to the product itself among the commission.

"They're absolutely right on in the market potential for this. It does more with less," Commissioner Bruce Snead said.

Kleffman said he expected the majority of his business to come from new buildings and the re-outfitting of current ones for less energy waste.

Debate ensued with a look at the plans for workers' wages. According to Kleffman's application, one of the proposed 24 workers in the first year would be paid $7 an hour and another 21 workers at $8 an hour, which some at the meeting said they thought would be too low. Two others will earn higher wages.

Mary Jo Murphy of the Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition urged commissioners to deny the proposal, citing a Minnesota study linking subsidies to businesses and low wages. A $7 hourly wage goes down to $6.40 when workers would have to pay in for benefits.

By the coalition's definition, a living wage for a family with two children is $8.11 an hour with full benefits and $8.90 without. Otherwise, workers have to visit the Flint Hills Breadbasket, Murphy said.

"I lived for this way many years, but I now work for a living wage," she said.

Commissioner Karen McCulloh, who voted against the proposal, said she was concerned about using public funds to support a company with wages running so close to subsistence.

"We have diminishing funds, and I'd like to invest in your company personally, but I don't think the city should," she said.

Snead said he believes the company will reach its potential.

"I firmly believe they'll have to respond to the market on the wages they pay," he said.

Commissioner Karen McCulloh, who voted against the proposal, said she was concerned about using public funds to support a company with wages running so close to subsistence.

Commissioner Roger Reitz said he was hesitant to support the company with public funds but he would grant the funds in faith that the wages go up each year as planned by its board of directors.

In other business, the commission unanimously approved the annexation of the Manhattan Regional Airport and Corporate Technology Park as well as portions of the Wildcat Creek Road right-of-way and South Airport Road's right-of-way.

An ordinance to rezone Miller Ranch Office Park to a business park district and a proposal to build a shoulder along North Manhattan Avenue from Kimball Avenue to Claflin Road also were addressed. Both were approved 5-0.

Lecture should bring prominent speakers

Ronald Reagan. Alan Shepard. Jimmy Carter. Colin Powell.

They're names that have defined generations. They're figures who have shaped the nation and the world. They're also individuals who have given Landon Lectures.

The next lecturer will be former Sen. Howard Baker, the son-in-law of the late Alf Landon, for whom the lecture series is named. Baker had a long career in the legislature and was chief of staff for President Reagan.

With all due respect to Baker, it's questionable whether he is a prominent enough figure to revive the Landon Lecture Series after 15 months without a speaker.

"Who?" members of the K-State community will ask upon hearing of the selection of Baker. Baker's lack of prominence probably will result in one of the smallest crowds the lecture has had. It's unfortunate, because Baker's experience as minority leader during the Watergate scandal could be relevant after the recent impeachment trial.

Unfortunately, for a lot of students, knowledge just isn't enough when it comes to a Landon Lecture. Students expect speakers who are prestigious as well as relevant to deliver such lectures. While Baker might have fallen into this category when he gave a lecture in 1979, it's doubtful most people think he does today.

The Landon Lecture Committee has a tough job to try to find speakers who are available, affordable, prominent and relevant. But in trying to find a balance, the committee has swayed too far away from stature.

There's no doubt that students should go to the Landon Lecture to hear the former senator, but when March 9 rolls around, the committee should realize why they didn't.

And remember that when looking for other lecturers.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

THE PEOPLE'S BUSINESS

Impeachment process serves as cleansing process, strengthens Americans

The trial of the century is over, and Washington, D.C., is vowing to get on with the "people's business."

But the "people's business" has been going on through this entire episode. It never did come to a pause. The Constitution was followed.

So let there be no talk about getting back to the "people's business." Our business is not simply drafting legislation and passing more laws. Our business is equally the enforcement of those laws.

If reasonable questions arise regarding the abuse of the law by a public official, then it is healthy for our government to inquire into possible wrongdoing. This cleansing process was beneficial for the country.

It is nonsense to regard the president's impeachment and the subsequent trial as being anything but the "people's business." If there is one thing from the procedure we must regret, it is the Senate's failure to convict.

Despite its faint-hearted character in voting to acquit, the country is relieved to have the trial concluded. So are the Clintons.

On Sunday, Bill and Hillary Clinton passed out chocolate onboard Air Force One on their way to Mexico. President Clinton's brief trip was taken in hopes of bringing encouragement to Mexican President Ernesto Zedillo in his fight against "drugs" and "government corruption."

U.S. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger is reported to have said, "President Zedillo is clearly trying to establish a clean government and respect for the rule of law."

I guess Clinton now is officially qualified to help Mexico keep a "clean government" and "respect" the "rule of law."

Before the House Judiciary Committee brought Clinton's conduct before the House of Representatives, we heard multiple claims from the White House that putting the president on trial would be bad for the country. It claimed we would be impaired while Congress debated the matter.

This nation has not felt any setbacks due to the trial process. If anything, we have been strengthened through the procedure. The only setbacks this nation has endured are the ones imposed on us by Clinton's conduct and his patrons who voted to acquit.

Here we are, five days after the House managers and the president's lawyers left the Senate chambers. Still no damage from the process itself.

Average citizens were not impaired during the impeachment process. Joe Citizen did not wake up every morning longing for the trial to end. Nor did he worry about his business not being conducted by Washington. Instead, Joe Citizen got up each morning and went on with his life.

This trial is exactly why we should never listen to liberal drizzle. When we follow the Constitution and the procedures outlined therein, we have nothing to fear.

There is an important precept we need to recognize now that we are in post-trial life.

Our freedom to be happy still exists. Despite the trial and despite what policies were or were not implemented, we are doing fine. We are still able to openly worship God. The freedom of the press seems to be doing OK. The economy isn't hurting.

Our business, our self-sufficiency in choosing what we do and who we become, is greater than we realize.

This past week, a single-parent mother in a crowd yelled at Gov. Jesse Ventura. She wanted more government help. She said her life was tough going to school and raising her child. Ventura bluntly told her that she was seeking help in the wrong place.

"Walk a mile in my shoes," she shouted back at him. "Walk a mile in my shoes!"

"You walk a mile in my shoes," he said amidst the booing crowd. He said he had worked hard for what he had. He had done nothing to cause her hardship. Her situation was neither a result of what he did nor what government has done. He stated his belief in self-sufficiency — a concept he has lived. The crowd booed him more.

Ventura was right. Self-sufficiency (from our government) needs to be propagated by our public officials more often. We have just lived through a procedure where this independence from government was verified.

Some of our officials in Washington are completely out of touch with reality. It is time they recognize who the people rely on. It is time for us to continue with the business we have been doing this entire time.

VIEWPOINT

SACKETT

Acknowledging abuse calms internal storms

Last week in the K-State Student Union, I bought a salad for lunch and donated a dollar to bring a speaker about domestic abuse to campus.

As part of my donation, I got to write the name of someone special to me on a paper heart to be placed on a wall in Justin Hall. So I wrote a name.

It was a name I have not thought of in a good, long time. At least six years, probably closer to seven. It was the name of a little girl who's probably not so little now. She was 9 the last time I saw her.

The dollar I donated wasn't a big deal; I have lots of dollars. The reason I donated it was a huge deal.

I was in an abusive relationship. Even as I type those words, a part of me is saying, "No you weren't, take that back. He never hit you."

Maybe not, but sometimes I wish he would have because it would have hurt less. Sometimes I forget all about it. Then I'll overhear my neighbors screaming at each other from across the street, and I'm 19 all over again, hiding in the bathroom with a towel over my head, waiting for the yelling to stop.

Looking back, I like to think that aliens invaded my body for a year and a half and forced me to stay in a relationship that was not good on any level. In reality, I think I just didn't know any better.

My parents hated the guy, and I think that if they had an inkling how bad it was they would have dragged me back home by my hair. But I was a teenager who thought she knew more than her parents.

I come from a loving home. My parents have been happily married for the past 25 years. Screaming and abuse were never part of that. I always thought girls who were from "bad homes" got into bad relationships.

I didn't even realize how bad it was until I got to college and put some distance between us. I explained all this to a friend once who had been through something similar. She asked me why two intelligent, college-educated women can't tell until it's over — why we don't notice when it's happening.

The closest explanation I could come up with is that it's a little like being in a storm — you know the storm is bad, you take shelter as best you can, but until someone tells you those were gale-force winds and you're lucky to be alive, you think it was just a storm.

That's all that year and a half was for me. A storm that that just kept coming.
